“Sir,—In my letter of yesterday, No. 487, I reported the extraordinary change that had taken place in the position hitherto maintained by the enemy's fleet in the harbour of Sebastopol, and I now beg you will acquaint the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, that the same afternoon, on the appearance of the allied fleets in sight of Sebastopol, the whole of the vessels moored across the harbour were sunk by the Russians, leaving their masts more or less above water, and I went last evening to the mouth of the harbour to assure myself of this singular event.

“Captain Drummond has examined the harbour this morning, and reports that the lower mast heads of the ships are generally above water; that the passage is closed, except, perhaps, a small space near the shoal off the north battery, and the double booms inside are thus rendered more secure.

“Eight sail of the line are moored east and west, inside of the booms, and three of the ships are heeled over to give their guns more elevation to sweep over the land to the northward.

“An intelligent seaman, a deserter, who escaped from Sebastopol on the 22nd, had partly prepared us for some extraordinary movement. He had informed me that the crews of the ships moored across the harbour (to one of which he had been attached) had been landed, with the exception of a very few in each ship; that the vessels were plugged ready for sinking; that the guns and stores were all on board; and that the other ships were moored under the south side to defend the harbour from attack from the northward. He reported that the battle of Alma had greatly dispirited the Russians; that the troops had retreated on Sebastopol without a halt; that he believes the whole Russian force not to exceed 40,000. The man's statements were clear, and on points that came under his own observation were mostly corroborated, and I consider reliance may be placed on his information generally, considering the means his station in life afforded of enabling him to obtain it. At the request of Lord Raglan I have sent him on shore to act as a guide to the army on their approach to the environs of Sebastopol.

“The allied armies moved this afternoon to take up a position to the south of the port of Sebastopol, and the fleet will move so as to meet their arrival there.

“I have, &c.,

“J. W. D. DUNDAS, Vice-Admiral.

“To the Secretary of the Admiralty.”

No. 498. “Britannia, off the Katscha, Sept. 28.

“Sir,—I beg that you will acquaint the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty that, by the request of his Excellency General Lord Raglan, I have ordered 1,000 Marines of the fleet to be lent to the Agamemnon, in the harbour of Balaklava, to relieve a similar number of the British forces now employed in guarding the heights overlooking that port.

“The Albion and Vesuvius returned last night from off the Alma river, having brought down from the country and embarked on board the Avon transport about 340 wounded Russians, whom I immediately sent on in charge of Commander Rogers of the Albion, with a letter to the Governor of Odessa, of which the enclosure No. 1 is a copy.

“From the state of the country, Captain Lushington was obliged to use every precaution in protecting his people employed on this service; and yesterday afternoon he was forced to embark all his men under the guns of the Vesuvius, as a body of about 6,000 Russians had advanced rapidly upon him.

“The allied armies are in position to the south of Sebastopol, and the English cavalry and French reinforcements are expected hourly, but a strong N.E. wind is now against them.

“Marshal St. Arnaud has been obliged by ill-health to resign the command of the French army to General Canrobert, and the Marshal has left for France.

“The cholera is still showing itself occasionally among the ships of the fleet, but the crews generally are healthy.

“The army is still suffering considerably, but the change of temperature this morning will, I hope, prove beneficial; fortunately, the rains have not yet set in.—I have, &c.,

“J. W. D. DUNDAS, Vice-Admiral.

“Enclosure to 498.

“Sir,—I have the honour to inform your Excellency, that in consequence of the advance on Sebastopol of the allied armies, after the battle of the Alma, on the 20th inst., a number of wounded Russian officers and soldiers were left in the rear, in the small villages near the places where they had fallen, and by the request of his Excellency General Lord Raglan, I have collected as many as I could (about 340).

“In order to shorten the sufferings of these gallant soldiers, which a long sea voyage must necessarily increase, I have sent them to Odessa, rather than to Constantinople, the distance to the former being so much less.

“Commander Rogers, of the royal navy, has charge of them, under a flag of truce; and I trust your Excellency will, in the same feeling of humanity, receive and reconsider them as non-combatants until regularly exchanged, granting to the officer in charge an acknowledgment of the numbers and grades of the prisoners delivered over by him to your Excellency.—I have, &c., “J. W. D. DUNDAS, “Vice-Admiral and Commander-in-Chief.

A party from the British fleet have established themselves in the lighthouse of Capo Chersonese, which forms the extreme eastern corner of the promontory to the south of Sebastopol; and have relit the light which the Russians had extinguished.

GENERAL LETTER.

“Canterbury, Constantinople, Sept. 30.

“SIR,—Her Majesty's steam-vessel Beagle arrived yesterday morning from England and Malta, and went on in the evening to join the fleet off Sebastopol, complete with coals and water.

“The Vulcan sailed last evening for the Crimea, and the Industry, Cambrin, Andes, Colombo, and Kangaroo steam-transports are ready. Some of these vessels take up coiliers, with about 1,700 tons of fuel for the fleet, besides several coal-ships sent on to Varna.

“The Industry will be employed as a steam-collier, and carries between 700 and 800 tons.

“The Caduceus transport arrived on the 28th from the Crimea with 270 sick from the army, having lost a great number on the passage down. The Courier transport, also with sick, came down yesterday, but got ashore some miles up the Bosphorus, but I have removed all the sick to Sentari by steam-tenders.

“The Turkish Government having kindly given every assistance in their power in complying with our wants, I have also applied to them for more hosteads for the hospital, and am myself contracting for 200 wooden trestles, they being much required.

“I have pleasure in co-operating with the military authorities with a view to the care of the sick and wounded, and from the unremitting attention of the staff, they are made as comfortable as possible under existing circumstances.

“A Russian brigadier-general died of his wounds last night at Sentari, and will be buried to-day with military honours.

“Another general has also arrived from the Crimea, who will be sent on to Malta, by direction of the Commander-in-Chief, by the first opportunity.

“I beg to enclose a statement [not enclosed] of the sick and wounded soldiers, made out as correctly as can be ascertained during the present press of duty.—I have, &c., “EDWARD BOXER, Rear-Admiral, “Superintendent.

“To the Secretary of the Admiralty, London.”

METROPOLIS.

ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—At the monthly general meeting held at the society's house in Hanover-square, Mr. William Yarrell, F.L.S., in the chair, Messrs. E. W. Wadson and James Ivall were elected fellows of the society; and Messrs. Sussex Milbank, R. Webb, E. Laforest, C. W. Dilke, H. F. Todd, and T. Presland were proposed as candidates for the fellowship. The menagerie was stated to be in a high state of efficiency, and the flower-garden particularly attractive in consequence of the rich display of dahlias and other autumnal plants. The total number of visitors during the year has already amounted to 366,643.

RACKETS.—BELVIDERE COURT, PENTONVILLE.—On Saturday

week a spirited match was played between the London Amateur and his co-winner of the cups this season, against George Erwood and Mr. John Coplin. After some remarkably fine play the match was won by the latter players by three games to one. The extraordinary continuation of the fine weather has led to the prolongation of what is technically called "the season" at this court, although the play, in fact, continues the year round, under the superintendence of George Erwood, who daily gives gratuitous instruction to gentlemen desirous of becoming proficient in rackets.

Our Opera-Glass.

ADÉLPHI.—On Monday night, after another successful representation of "Monsieur Jacques," Dance's amusing farce, "The Station-house," was revived with Mr. Morris Barnett as the vivacious Millefleurs. It is not often that an actor has his versatile powers so severely taxed as was the case with Mr. Barnett on this occasion, and it is but just to him to say he came off triumphantly. The change from the poor old starving musician to the light-hearted son of la belle France was wonderful; and not alone in dress and appearance was the change effected, but the actor so identified himself with the young Parisian, that it was difficult to believe that it was he who, a few minutes before, had brought tears into the eyes by his depicting of Monsieur Jacques. In other respects the farce was equally well cast. Mr. Leigh Murray sustained the character of Valentine Quill—a fact which made the part of equal interest with that of the Frenchman. The scene in which Quill endeavours to get up a quarrel with Millefleurs, who is nothing less, was extremely humorous. The mistakes made by the lawyer's clerk, through not understanding the language of his volatile adversary, kept the house in constant roars of laughter. Miss Wyndham—an addition to the Adelphi company this season—was the Fanny Fiddle; and the spirit and sprightliness with which she acquitted herself give promise of her attaining a high position in her profession. On Thursday evening another revival took place—that of Lunn's farce "Cajpers and Coronets," Mr. Morris Barnett sustaining his original character, the Marquis de Grandville, in which he was a very Turveydrop for deportment, and gave a lively portrayal of the châliant danseur, endeavouring to be the great marquis, and yet still unable to divest himself entirely of the recollection of his former saltant occupation. The fear and anguish which he exhibits lest Lady Meriton, to whom he is betrothed, should discover that he has been but a dancer, were given with an intensity and dramatic power which raised them far above the level of mere farce acting. At the conclusion, Mr. Barnett was called before the curtain. The French opera-dancer, Mademoiselle Flure, as rendered by Mrs. Keeley, was a feature in the piece; her French was unexceptionable, her acting full of life and exuberance of spirit. An imitation of La Xena, the Spanish dancer, which she introduced, took the house by storm; her very first pose elicited a round of applause, and a hearty encore followed the dance. Mrs. Leigh Murray enacted Lady Meriton with that elegance and repose which are necessary to its impersonation, and which served to form a striking contrast to the other characters. The Honourable Frank Rivers was allotted to Miss Mary Keeley; and a dashing little honourable she made, showing wonderful improvement, as well as unmistakable signs of becoming a worthy successor to her talented mother. The Marquis's servant, James, was humorously filled by Mr. Rogers, whose awkward imitation of the dancing scene raised a hearty laugh. The house on both occasions was crowded. Mr. Morris Barnett has announced his benefit for Monday night, with a programme containing five of the most attractive pieces presented here; these, with his own legitimate claims upon the public, will secure him a bumper house. The new drama by Tom Parry, Esq., is announced for Tuesday evening. The title is "The Summer's Storm." The story is well told, and the cast of characters embraces all the members of the company. A new farce by W. Brough, Esq., is in rehearsal, so that the little theatre is truly "all alive, oh."

MARYLEBONE THEATRE.—With Shakspeare's play of "As You Like It," Mr. W. Wallack commenced a second season at this theatre on Saturday evening. The play was in every respect done justice to, and the numerous audience who assembled on the occasion testified, by their judicious applause, that Shakspeare is fully appreciated in this quarter of the metropolis. Mr. Wallack sustained the part of the melancholy Jacques with care, and in some instances originality. Although full effect was given to the cynical nature of the attendant on the banished duke, the actor at the same time allowed in his by-play some glimpses of a better mind to creep in, which made Jacques something more than the snarling satirical personage we have been used to behold him. Mrs. Wallack was a dashing and vivacious Rosalind, looking remarkably well in the "doublet and hose;" Touchstone he found a humorous representative in Mr. Shalders, and Mr. G. Cook's Adam was a fine and feeling performance. The songster Amins was sustained by Mr. Edwards, in whom—not a little to our surprise, it must be confessed—we recognised Mr. Edward Murray, a brother of the talented comedian, Leigh Murray. In Amins, Mr. Murray sang the delightful music with a simplicity and clearness of intonation materially aiding its effects; the singer possesses a voice of a good quality, and in the management of it he evinces that he has profited by good education. One distinguishing point about Mr. Murray's singing worthy of especial notice is, that every word he sings is clearly and distinctly enunciated. The manner in which the vocalist acquitted himself in the charming ballad "Blow, blow, thou winter wind," gained for him the marked approbation of his auditors. The play has been tastefully and effectively put upon the stage, both as regards dresses and scenery.

PROVINCIAL.

THE DISASTROUS FIRE AND LOSS OF LIFE AT NEWCASTLE.

(From the Fifth Edition of the Newcastle Chronicle.)

Since Saturday night the river engines and hose from the water-pipes have played incessantly upon the fires at both sides of the river, and have been effectual in keeping it down. The greatest excitement still continues. The principal thoroughfares are guarded by soldiers and policemen, a step which was rendered necessary by the great influx of strangers into the town. The trains which came from all parts were crowded with passengers, and Dean-street, the Tyne and High-Level Bridges, the sand-hill and the streets in Gateshead, were thronged with people who were continually blocking up the way, and obliging the police to use all their efforts to keep them moving.

The direction of the wind changed in the morning, and, driving the smoke from Hillgate, enabled the workmen to enter, and remove some portion of the debris. Newcastle streets were filled with a suffocating smoke, which was felt as far as the edge of the Moor, and while Gateshead was comparatively clear. Another body, that of a young man, named Mosley, was found in the morning, and about noon a charred and crumbling mass was discovered, without the most remote resemblance of humanity. A piece of the coat and a bunch of keys lying close by it have led to its identification, and placed it beyond a doubt that it is the remains of the son of John Dobson Esq., architect, in this town. Other three bodies have also been recovered, and are enumerated below.

In every church and chapel on Sunday special reference was made to the dreadful calamity, and collections were made in aid of the sufferers. At one o'clock an alarm of fire was given at the head of Dean-street, and a fireman proceeded at once into the warehouse of Mr. Orisoni, from whence the smoke issued. A bundle of smoking rags was found in the room, and a rumour that two barrels of gunpowder were placed near it raised the excitement to an intense height. The barrels were, however, carefully removed, and a few buckets of water extinguished the burning rags.

Besides the four bodies recovered from the ruins on Sunday, the remains of other two—a man and a woman—are known to be lying close to the end of Mr. Davidson's mill. A fall of stones above them prevented their being got out. It is thought that if the passage-way were cleared between the mill and Mr. Dunn's property, all the bodies of the victims of the explosion will be found. This, however, will require a great amount of labour; and there appears to be some difficulty in finding men for the work.

At the west end of the quay, and at the custom-house, strong barriers have been erected to prevent the passage of the crowd, and soldiers and policemen guard the entrances. Workmen are busily employed in carting away the rubbish. There now appears little danger of any further outbreak. In the neighbourhood of George's stairs the fire is quite extinguished.

Lord Palmerston, in compliance with the request forwarded by the Mayor and corporation of Gateshead, has appointed Captain Ducane, of the Ordnance, to superintend the investigation into the cause of the late catastrophe. Captain Ducane has arrived.

Bodies recovered in Hillgate yesterday.—Mr. Mosley, smith, Gateshead; Alex. Dobson, 23, architect, Newcastle; Thomas Sharp, Gateshead (found in two parts, and identified by a gold watch, and two dog-whistles, discovered in his pockets); Martin Hall, slater, Newcastle, one of the North British Fire Brigade.

The last two bodies, remaining at the Gateshead police-station, have now been identified. The names of the deceased are:—William Battersby Scott, aged 24, blacksmith, Gateshead; Peter May, aged 18, labourer.

The Infirmary.—There are now fifty-nine patients lying in the Infirmary. Altogether seven have died here, four of them since Saturday. We have obtained the names of three of these—viz., John Humble, 38, painter; Mary Carse, 21; John Young. The name of the other is not known. A number are in a hopeless state.

We have a list of about fifty cases treated by Mr. Craster, of the Gateshead Dispensary; but there was a number of others whom he attended to in the streets, or in some house where he found them, which it has been impossible to record.

INQUEST ON THE SUFFERERS AT GATESHEAD.

On Saturday forenoon, Mr. Favell, coroner for North Durham, opened an inquest on the bodies of the sufferers, in the Police-court, Town Hall. Mr. Bush appeared to watch the case for Mr. Sisson, the proprietor of the warehouses. H. G. Liddell, Esq., M.P. was on the bench.

The following are the names of the jury:—Mr. John Greene, foreman; Mr. Bryan John Prockter, Mr. Matthew Thompson, Mr. Samuel Neville, Mr. John Sowerby, Mr. Henry E. Munro, Mr. Wm. Lishman, Mr. John Golightly, Mr. Joseph Abbot Hymers, Mr. Robt. Coulthard, Mr. John Vickers, Mr. Geo. Richd. Cox, Mr. Joseph Fenwick, and Mr. Edward Bruce.

The Coroner observed that he had given orders for the removal of most of the bodies, as it was distressing to the surviving relatives to have them detained here. Having taken evidence as to the explosion having caused the death of these parties, the next thing would be to consider what caused the fire and the explosion. As he knew there was a strong feeling in the borough on the subject, he was anxious to receive all the evidence that could be offered, from whatever quarter.

Mr. Greene, the foreman of the jury, said that he had been anxious to take part in this inquiry; for he wished to correct an opinion of certain parties, who, knowing his firm were large dealers in explosive substances, supposed that this explosion had been caused by their gunpowder. He wished to deny that either there, or in any other place not sanctioned by law, had they any gunpowder. He did not wish to be understood as saying that this explosion was caused by gunpowder at all; but he would do his best in endeavouring to find out what had caused it.

William Henry Schorey, the police superintendent of Gateshead, was sworn, and gave the following testimony:—I was at home, and the report came to me of the fire at the worsted manufactory, at half past twelve o'clock, on Thursday night. Thomas Scott, a policeman, was on duty at the fire, and I sent him, by direction of the mayor, with an order to the barracks for soldiers. Several soldiers came. The fire was confined to the worsted manufactory when I first saw it. Joiners appeared to have been making alterations in the boilers. The great bulk of the fire was on the side of the factory next to Mr. Sisson's warehouse. It continued to rage there violently till about two o'clock, when it issued in complete volumes through the windows of Mr. Sisson's warehouse. I had left that part to go into Mr. Wilson's skinnery, and had just got as far as the vinegar manufactory when the explosion took place in Mr. Sisson's. This was ten minutes or a quarter-past three. There was such a crash that I thought everything was coming down. It was dead darkness in a moment. After recovering from the shock, I was preparing to come out when I heard a tremendous crash of falling buildings. I then came up the Church-walk, and found houses there blown down, the soldiers bleeding, and women and children half-buried in the ruins, and screaming for help. We helped them out as best we could. Two of the officers were bleeding very much in the head, and the soldiers were helping their comrades. We forwarded the wounded in Mr. Barras's carts to the infirmary, and the dead bodies to the police-station. There would be far on to a score of wounded, and three carts were going. Among the dead was Thomas Scott; he was twenty-seven years of age. The coroner here read over the following list of the dead:—Robert Pattinson, aged 38, tanner and town councillor; Charles Hamilton, aged 53, hair-dresser; Cranmer Hastings Paynter, aged 19, ensign in her Majesty's 26th Regiment; John Stephenson, lance-corporal, ditto; Anthony Willis, skinner, about 60, of Gateshead; Charles Duke, aged 12, a bricklayer's apprentice; Charles Duke, father of the above, bricklayer; Frank Conway, aged 6, son of Daniel Conway, blacksmith, killed in his own house by the roof falling; a man named McKenny, a labourer; and another man unknown. The above were mostly got out of the rubbish, and were apparently killed by the explosion. There are others missing, viz.:—Mr. Charles Bertram, a magistrate; Mr. William Davison, jun., miller; Mr. Henry Harrison, cooper, of Dean-street, Newcastle; besides a female and two firemen.

Robert Sloan, sergeant in her Majesty's 26th Regiment being sworn, said:—On Friday morning, between two and three o'clock, we were ordered out with the fire-engine. A party of fifty men fell in, and brought the engine to Gateshead. There was a sergeant and officer besides. Cranmer H. Paynter was an ensign in our regiment. About three o'clock he came with an order to me to halt to see where we could get water to work the engine. He was not in uniform, but I knew him to be an officer. We halted, but shortly after got an order to go to the rear of the building on fire. When we were taking the hose to put on the suction pipe, Mr. Paynter was there giving directions. Captain Hinesy and others had broken the windows to get the pipe through. Just after that the explosion took place. The ground was shaken and the place was darkened with the dust and smoke. Mr. Paynter was afterwards found quite dead among the rubbish. I have no doubt the explosion was the cause of his death. John Stephenson, lance-corporal, was with the engine. He was at the same place when the explosion occurred. He was struck on the side of the head with some large missile. He was not covered with the rubbish. The horse was blown over upon us on the Church-walk. Another was reported dead, but is supposed to be recovering. I have seen a fort blown up on the Whampoa river in China. It was the enemy's powder that blew up. As far as I can judge this was a similar explosion. I know nothing of the cause of this explosion. By a Juror: I know the smell of gunpowder quite well. I do not think it was that smell. It was something like the smell of sulphur or saltpetre. I was under the rubbish. I had my wits about me. I was afraid of something falling, and had presence of mind to crouch near a wall with my hands behind my head. It strikes me there was a second explosion, but it was nothing like the other. There was a sudden lighting up of the darkness, which lasted some time.

Robert Harrison Wilson, surgeon to the police force and the board of guardians, was then sworn. He said, I believe the list of killed read over to be correct, as far as I can judge. I believe the immense fall of material, the immense quantity of sulphurous acid in the atmosphere, and the fire all combined to cause their death. Most of them were killed by blows; and the sulphurous acid would kill the remainder. There was so much sulphurous acid formed by the combustion of sulphur that that alone was sufficient to kill them. The body of Ensign Paynter was much bruised, and a large quantity of blood was coming from the mouth and nose. I suppose there must have been internal injury. Corporal Stephenson suffered extensive compound fracture of the skull, which was, I think, sufficient to cause death. Charles Duke, sen., had nearly the whole of the lower extremities burnt off, and the other parts of the body very much charred. The right foot of Charles Duke, the younger, was burnt off and the lower part of the leg much burnt. The body of McKenny was much burnt; the skull of Frank Conway was fractured. The body of Thomas Scott, policeman, was marked all over with severe bruises. It had a wound on the head, but no fracture. He probably died of suffocation or some internal injury. The body of a man unknown, supposed to be W. Scott is much bruised. The body of Robert Pattinson was much bruised, but when discovered he was completely covered by stones and rubbish, so that I think he must have died from suffocation. The body of Charles Hamilton was also much bruised about the head and chest; the right fore arm was fractured and dislocated about the elbow. The body of Anthony Willis was much bruised about the head and chest, and there was bleeding from the ears and nose. I have no doubt they were all killed by the explosion.

Percival Smith, a keeper of the bonded warehouse from whence the explosion proceeded, being sworn, said he was employed by Mr. George Sisson, to keep the premises which exploded on Friday morning. In the lower part of the warehouse were stored 200 tons of iron, 800 tons of lead, 70 tons of manganese, 130 tons of nitrate of soda, 300 tons of brimstone, 80 tons of guano, and about 10 tons of alum in lump and cask. The nitrate of soda was in bags and in three different apartments, on the lower flat. The sulphur was loose, and he believed there would be more than he first stated; he thought the full quantity might be stated at from 300 to 500 tons. He kept a book in which he entered all that was stored, and all that left the house. That book he now produced. After the entry is made the book is sent to Mr. Sisson. On the second flat about 400 tons of sulphur in bulk were stored. Witness had previously omitted to mention a small quantity of Roman cement in the first flat. In the second flat were 40 tons of ochre, 10 tons of peat ash, 5 tons of arsenic, between 200 and 300 tons of guano in bags, 107 tons of manganese in casks, 5 tons of alum in casks, about a ton and a half of tar in three barrels, half a ton of zinc in casks, one case of yellow metal weighing about five cwt., 20 tons of pumice-stone, and 30 tons of copperas. On the third flat were 10 tons of pumice-stone, 500 tons of brimstone, 5 tons of tin in boxes, and 85 tons of bone ashes. On the fourth flat, 170 tons of salt in bulk, 500 tons of sulphur, and 15 tons of pumice-stone. On the fifth flat, 70 tons of salt, and 180 tons of sulphur. The sixth flat contained 50 tons of manure, and the seventh was empty. The total amount of sulphur on the premises witness calculated at 3,000 tons, the nitrate of soda 130, the salt 240, alum 15 tons, and the peat ash in bulk 10 tons. There was no gunpowder on that night in the warehouse that he was conscious of, nor was there any charcoal or saltpetre. It was impossible to put gunpowder in the premises without his knowledge. He could not account for the explosion. Has no reason to believe that gunpowder was ever introduced into the warehouse under any other name. The manganese casks he had occasionally sorted. He had seen one of the cement casks broken. The pumice-stone was also opened in a like way, and the copperas was tried by the Custom-house officers, previous to being warehoused. The keys of the warehouse were kept by himself alone. The arsenic was in small casks, bound with iron hoops. It came in in eight-ton lots, and in 65 casks, from Mr. Coll Taylor. The warehouse was free, but some of the lofts were let, and the keys kept by the person who engaged them. The outer keys are kept by himself. Messrs. Leide-mann and Co. have the first floor in 43 bond, and in 132 bond. Ashton and Co. have the second and sixth floor in 43 bond; Harrison, Carr, and Co., leave the ground floor in 60 bond; Jos. Harrison, the second floor in 42 bond; Mr. Black, the first floor in 70 bond; Mr. Belden, the fourth floor in 43 bond. These are all that are rented, and no goods are warehoused there by these parties without their giving an account to witness. The three tons of arsenic which was carried away was taken indiscriminately from the general lot. Witness thought there were 50 tons of soda in Mr. Leide-mann's loft, which he had forgotten to mention. It was in casks, which would come either from H. L. Pattinson or Emery's.—By a Jurymen: In one vault with 45 tons of nitrate of soda were 47 tons of sulphur, with a tarpaulin cover to divide them. The vault was air-tight, and no entrance had by the door. The vault was a stone-arched roof. Another lot of nitrate, containing 30 tons, lay in a warehouse on a ground-floor adjoining the vault; 50 tons more of nitrate was lying close to the last, with a wall to separate them. There was a lot of sulphur (70 tons) lying in the same place, quite uncovered, and one touching the other. The nitrate of soda was in bags, and the room was only closed up with other goods. There was no naphtha or oil of vitriol on the premises.—By the Coroner: He had been three years warehouseman to Mr. Sisson. The pent ash was in a different floor from the nitre, and could not fall upon it. Witness was at the fire, about forty yards from it, at the time of the explosion. The fire broke into the street at three o'clock, when there was one report louder than the crack of a gun. He met some people at the time, who had been accustomed to work among the nitrate of soda, and they expressed their fears of an explosion. There were then two more reports. One of the men is called Thomas Dodds, a quayside labourer, and John Bewick was the name of the other. This was at the west end of Hillgate. Witness said if the nitrate did explode, that would be the finish of it, as it was lying in three lots at the time the great explosion took place. Witness was knocked down by the explosion, and his companions were forced into a doorway near. Had never seen an explosion by nitre, but his opinion was that it was the nitre which had blown up. Witness thought the fire commenced in the middle of the warehouse next to the wharf. The roof of the warehouse all fell in before the explosion. Heard the small explosion after the fall of the roof.—By Mr. Bush: The floors were made of wood, and the burning material would be charred, and no doubt would fall among the sulphur and part of the nitre.

Mr. Sisson informed the coroner that the County Fire Office were the owners of the warehouse, and he only acted as their agent. The assessor of the company was at present there in Newcastle. Persons wishing to use the premises ought to come to him, and he thought always did so, but in no one instance had he ever been asked to store gunpowder in his warehouse, and if any one should have been there at any time, it was entirely without his knowledge and consent. He thought it impossible that powder should be smuggled into the warehouse. Mr. Sisson further added that he would hand in to the coroner, at the next examination, a detailed statement of all that was in the warehouse, and he expressed his desire of giving every facility and assistance to the coroner's inquiry.

One of the jurymen suggested that as it was generally reported that a large quantity of gunpowder had been stored in these warehouses, the rumour should be traced until it was discovered whether there was any real foundation for it. The Coroner said he would summon any one who seemed to have the slightest knowledge of the fact that gunpowder had been deposited there; and as the casks of arsenic had excited the attention of the jury, he would issue a summons for the gentleman to whom it belonged.

Pereival Smith said, he knew the boatman who had brought the arsenic, and taken away a portion of it again; and the coroner included him among the list of witnesses.

One jurymen said he had heard Mr. Robert Plummer state that it was mentioned to him that gunpowder had been stored in that warehouse; and another jurymen had heard Mr. Alexander G. Gray make a similar statement, adding further that he (Mr. Gray) had threatened to prosecute one party who had gunpowder stored in the Javil Group, and that the combustible had then been conveyed to the warehouses in Hillgate. Both of these gentlemen were, therefore, directed to be summoned.

Mr. Neville, one of the jury, inquired if they might have the assistance of a practical chemist to guide them in their verdict, and the coroner concurred at once, telling the jury to make their own selection from any one in the neighbourhood. Mr. H. L. Pattinson was the gentleman then selected by the jury as best acquainted with the nature of nitrate of soda, and the inquiry was adjourned.

On the same day an inquest was held at the Dead House, Quayside, on the body of Robert Laidler, aged twenty-three, an engineer in the employ of Messrs. Stephenson and Co., who was found in the hold of the brig Familion, a few hours after the explosion took place. The evidence (that of his brother) went no further than the identification of the body; and in order that the fullest particulars may transpire, the inquest was adjourned.

THE LATEST PARTICULARS.

The firemen are still playing on part of the massive smouldering ruins, while numerous workmen are excavating other portions in search of the bodies of the sufferers buried beneath. Up to this morning twenty-five bodies have been found at the scene of the conflagration; and these, with seven since dead in the infirmary, make a total at present of thirty-two. From the immense accumulation of debris adjoining the burnt warehouse, it will take days of incessant toil to remove, and, as the workmen are digging into its very heart, it is supposed that some time will elapse before they recover the remaining bodies of those missing, among whom is that of Charles Bertram, Esq., merchant, and a justice of the peace for Gateshead. All the bodies have been identified, with the exception of three, which were so mutilated and charred as to prevent any person distinguishing either their features or their clothes.

As to the seat of the eruption, that is clearly marked out by a huge crater, about fourteen feet deep, at the bottom of the bond warehouse; and as to the probable cause of the explosions, considerable light is thrown upon it by the lucid evidence of Hugh Lee Pattinson, Esq., the able chemist, from which we find that the explosion, instead of being caused by gunpowder, was caused by a rush of water falling upon melted and intensely-heated sulphur and nitrate of soda, by which steam was engendered with such incredible swiftness and power as to surpass human computation. This crater originally formed the vaults of the bond-warehouse, where there were deposited several tons of sulphur, covered over with a tarpaulin, while above this were several tons of nitrate of soda. This having burnt some time, and water falling upon it, produced, it is alleged, the fearful catastrophe in question. As to gunpowder, there is not a particle of evidence to show that any was ever within the walls of the warehouse.

The amount of claims on the various insurance offices will be somewhere about £140,000, but the liabilities of each cannot yet be ascertained. The Newcastle Office is the principal loser, and the claims upon it are between £20,000 and £30,000; the North British, £15,000; the Leeds and Yorkshire, £7,000; and the County, who are mortgagees of the warehouse that exploded, £5,000.

The total damage on both sides of the river is estimated at £200,000, of which about £140,000 worth is insured. About £200 in halfpence have been taken as toll on the High Level Bridge in three days, from parties who went there to obtain a view of the burning ruins.

SCOTLAND.

THE QUEEN'S RETURN TO LONDON.

(By Electric Telegraph.)

The Queen left Balmoral at nine o'clock a.m. Oct. 12, posted to Banbury by Ballantyre and Abonyne, and proceeded by the Deeside Railway to Aberdeen, arriving there at three minutes past one. Thence the route was by the Aberdeen Railway to Stonehaven, where Her Majesty and suite lunched. She left Stonehaven at two o'clock, and travelled by the Scottish Midland and Scottish Central Railways to Edinburgh, arriving in that city, at Holyrood, at seven. The weather was remarkably fine.

EDINBURGH, Oct. 12.—The Queen, Prince Albert, and Royal Family left Balmoral at nine this morning, and arrived in Edinburgh at seven in the evening. Lord Aberdeen and Lord Burgher accompanied the royal party, who leave tomorrow for Hull, at halfpast ten.—They will arrive at the latter place at 6 p.m., where the illustrious visitors will remain for the evening at the Station Hotel.

Foreign Intelligence.

FRANCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Paris, Thursday, Oct. 12.

The late Battle—Scant justice to British courage in the French Marshal's Despatch—Its recognition by Prince Napoleon and other French Officers—Ode on the victory by Mery—Marshal St. Arnaud—Flight of Mlle. Crivelli—Mlle. Georges—New French Police.

THE great, or rather, only topic here is the late glorious victory of the Alma; but the English in Paris, and, it is to be hoped in London too, are indignant at the manner in which the glorious success of the British troops in the battle was mentioned in St. Arnaud's despatch. Upon this gallant force fell all the real krunt of the conflict. The river to cross, inaccessible heights to climb, and well-defended trenches to take possession of—and all this in the face of the murderous fire of the enemy's batteries and musketry—required a dauntless valour, perseverance, and energy to which the part taken by the French in the action was mere child's play, and the success of which perfectly astounded our allies themselves. They (the French) had their work partly done by the guns of the fleet, which threw the enemy into disorder for them. They have done their business well and bravely, no doubt, but they had neither the difficulties of position nor the force of the enemy to encounter in comparison to the English; and yet Marshal St. Arnaud, after blaming the delay of the English troops in arriving at the place indicated by their orders—which blame the subsequent accounts show was entirely unfounded—admits that they bravely made up for this delay! And, afterwards, having described the conflict, coolly adds, "A quatre heures et demi l'armée Française était partout victorieuse!" Rather scant notice this for men who had in reality won the day, and it is known that there are letters in town from French officers—Prince Napoleon is mentioned as one—which describes the bravery of the English troops, and the manner in which they were not only commanded, but led on to the thick of the fight by their officers, as something beyond all praise. Honour to them! Many of these gallant young fellows have hitherto been chiefly known as frequenters of the opera, Hyde-park, and as leaders of ton in London, habits which, however, did not in the least impair their courage, or their devotion to their duty, in the hour of danger. Prince Napoleon fought in the division next the British, and was therefore an eyewitness of their conduct. His testimony is, therefore, of double value. In fine, the British troops—men, officers, and commander—never proved themselves more worthy their ancient renown than on that day, as the sad catalogue of the slain and wounded bears melancholy evidence.

Mery, the French poet, has written some touching stanzas on "La Victoire de l'Alma," which are to be set to music for her Majesty. The following is a free, but in substance, correct, translation of the concluding strophe. After a beautiful allusion to the union of the two nations—whose armies have never met before, save in mortal strife—he touches on the fate of the fallen, and thus proceeds:—

Ye Brave! When the goblet we manfully crown
To you—to the victors that fell by your side,
Two Nations shall weep o'er their dead of renown,
But even their tears shall be mingled with pride.
Ne'er—o'er, for their country shall spirits more brave,
Unconquered, their last pulse to her battles resign,
For Champions more dauntless, by land or by wave,
Never bled at her combat, or died at her shrine.

The Emperor and Empress have, with a just sense of the feeling occasioned by the number of victims who fell, remained for the last few days in strict seclusion; and his Majesty, when writing to General Canrobert, confirming him in the command of the army, wrote also to General Lord Raglan. The contents of his Majesty's letter have, of course, not transpired; but, from his well-known sentiments of the noble veteran, there is no doubt that it is to congratulate him on the victory, in gaining which his Lordship and his countrymen so largely contributed.

The unexpected intelligence of the death of Marshal St. Arnaud created some sensation in Paris, but by no means so great as that described in the papers, who, being nearly all under the Government, are obliged to re-echo the official bureau. He was a brave and gallant soldier; peace be to his name! This is not a moment to tear the curtain from his errors, which, if he has not been the victim of the grossest calumnies, were, socially, of the gravest and most indefensible nature.

Something decidedly wrong at the Grand Opera! The management seems to please neither the public nor the artists behind the curtain. Roger, its only tenor—I mean as an artist—declines to remain with courteous expressions of good-will and politesse, which cost nothing; and Madlle. Crivelli has taken French leave, having abruptly quitted the theatre. She was advertised to sing in "Les Huguenots" on Monday night; but, on the assembling of the audience, the gentleman "so pale and woe-begone" who represents the ghost of Priam at this theatre, as the ill-omened herald of bad news, came forward and stated that, in consequence of Madlle. Crivelli being non inventa, they were obliged to change the performance. On inquiring at the lady's house the reply was, that Madlle. Crivelli had left town for Boulogne by the Northern Railway! This is not the first time by any means that the fair Sofia has suddenly executed an evolution of this kind in the face of the public. Some three or four years ago a similar accident took place at the Italiens; and London, Italy, and Germany have witnessed, I believe, the like occurrence on the part of this gifted, but certainly most eccentric, young lady.

Poor Madlle. Georges is again acting at the Porte St. Martin. Such an exhibition is indeed pitiable; dignity, voice, beauty—all that once gave her reputation—is gone. It cannot, indeed, be said, "not a rack behind," for they have left one of awful dimensions. Many years before leaving the stage, the extreme obesity of Madlle. Georges rendered her a perfect object of commiseration to the many who still remembered the brilliant style in which a portion of her life was passed when, basking in the sunshine of imperial favour, she dazzled all the capitals of Europe—(this was when all the continental sovereigns were bowing at the footstool of the great conqueror)—with the splendour of her equipage and the magnificence of her beauty. People talk a good deal of the parsimony of the Government on occasions of this kind, which certainly would justify even a little extravagance in the way of clarity, particularly when such sums are lavished on the Grand Opera, under ministerial management. These scandalising comments are not confined to the Fanbong St. German, but are heard among the warmest friends of the Emperor. The grand idea of making the fallen beauty the keeper of the sticks and umbrellas at the National Exhibition next year, has led to a thousand bon mots at the expense of the Government, or that department of it which restricts to itself the agreeable task of giving away the "good things" at the disposition of the State. Nevertheless, the place will be worth having, but as Hamlet says—"While the grass grows," &c. It is but honest justice to add that the serious occupations of the head of the Government keep him wholly in the dark respecting all such "amusements," which, nevertheless, create much scandal and unpopularity which attaches to the master, as well as to his subalterns.

Great—but quite unfounded—fears are entertained that the proposed new police system will not succeed in Paris, the French being such ardent sons of liberty—as they say—that they have a natural antipathy to all appearance of authority. This is true to a certain extent. The Parisians have ever been impatient of all rule, and even their Roman masters found them troublesome. Julian, when pro-consul at Suetone, found them so refractory, that he was obliged to take half a legion to reduce them to order, which he did very effectually by administering a most tremendous thrashing. The whole history of Paris, in fact, shows that no populace was ever more quiet when governed by an inflexible hand witness their undisturbed tranquillity under the first Napoleon, and since the accession of the present Emperor.

COURT MARTIAL—SENTENCE ON LIEUTENANT KNIGHT.

PORTSMOUTH, Oct. 10.—A court martial was held on board the Victory to-day, to try Lieutenant Knight, of the Royal Marines, for a breach of the regulations of the service, in taking Matilda Jane Lodge on board the Victorious, hulk to the Dauntless, on the night of Sunday, the 17th of September. The court consisted of Rear-Admiral Martin (president), Captains the Hon. — Grey, Sir T. Maitland, Elliot, Robinson, Massie, the Hon. F. Hastings, Haeris, and Crispin. The following were the charges against Lieutenant Knight:—"For that the said First Lieutenant Frederick Charles Knight, of her Majesty's Royal Marine Forces, did on the night of Sunday, the 17th of September, 1854, bring on board her Majesty's hulk Victorious, two unmarried women, and did act improperly towards such women, in supplying them with wine and spirits in immoderate quantities, when so on board the said hulk, the same being scandalous action in derogation of God's honour, and in corruption of good manners. For that the said First Lieutenant Frederick Charles Knight did, on board her Majesty's hulk, Victorious, on the night of Sunday, the 17th of September, 1854, suggest to Mr. Robert Heneock, midshipman, falsely to inform the chaplain of her Majesty's ship Dauntless, that the women which he, the said Lieutenant Frederick Charles Knight had so brought on board the said bulk were sisters of him, the said First Lieutenant, he, the first lieutenant, well knowing at the time that such was not true, the same being a scandalous action, in derogation of God's honour, and in corruption of good manners. For that the said First Lieutenant Frederick Charles Knight was on the 17th day of September, 1854, without his proper uniform, and without having obtained the requisite leave or permission dispensing with his wearing such uniform.—For that the said First Lieutenant Frederick Charles Knight was on the night of Sunday, the 17th day of September, 1854, and on the following morning, drunk on board her Majesty's bulk, Victorious.—The said First Lieutenant Frederick Charles Knight, at the times mentioned in the foregoing charges, being borne on the books of her Majesty's ship Danmless, then and now in commission." After the examination of a number of witnesses, the prisoner read his defence, in which he admitted the truth of the first charge, but pleaded in extenuation that the fault specified was committed in a moment of indiscretion, at the request of the girls themselves, and that he did not intend to have kept them long on board. With respect to the words forming the subject of the second charge they were uttered by him in joke, and he did not intend them to be repeated, nor think they would have been repeated to the chaplain. The third charge he admitted, but pleaded ignorance of the regulations on that point; and the fourth charge he indignantly denied, and asserted that no proof had been given in its support. The court found Lieutenant Knight guilty of the first and third charges, and acquitted him on the others; and taking into consideration the irreproachable character he has borne, sentenced him to be placed at the bottom of the list of first lieutenants of Royal Marines. Lieutenant Jervis was then tried for allowing the women to come on board on the night in question, and not reporting the fact to the officer in command of the ship. He was honourably acquitted of the charge, having had nothing to do with the affair. By the sentence on Lieutenant Knight that officer loses eleven years' service.

WRECK OF THE ARCTIC—DREADFUL LOSS OF LIFE.

We regret to announce the total loss of the United States Mail steamship Arctic, Captain Luce, for New York, from Liverpool.

"STATEMENT OF THE SECOND OFFICER."

"The following is the statement of Mr. Baahlam, second officer of the ill-fated steamer Arctic, who was dispatched from Renewa in search of the unfortunate vessel or her boats, and who has arrived in St. John's this morning, at ten o'clock.

"On Wednesday, Cape Race bearing S.W. by W., 65 miles distant, while running in a very thick fog, we were struck on the starboard bow, about 60 feet abaft the cutwater, by an iron steamer, which made three large holes in the ship, two below water, one of which was about 5½ feet in length, and 1 or 1½ in depth, leaving the whole cutwater and stern of the iron steamer clean through the Arctic's side. So dense was the fog, that the vessel could not be seen a minute before the collision. The wheel was put hard to starboard, the engine stopped instantly, and backed at full speed, until clear of the other steamer, which occupied a couple of minutes. The French steamer seemed to be sinking, bow first. Captain Luce immediately gave orders to clear away the quarter-boats, which was done, and Mr. Gourlay, chief officer, left the ship in charge of the starboard-boat, and in lowering the port-boat the Captain exclaimed, "Hoist up the boat again, Mr. Baahlam," and beckoned me to go to him. Upon doing so he ordered me to go over to the bow to ascertain, if possible, what damage had been done. I then found the holes above mentioned. Upon informing him of the facts, he ordered the ship's head to be kept for the land, which bore N.W. by W. By this time we had lost sight of the chief officer's boat, and the other steamer, which we supposed had sunk. We had not been on our course more than four or five minutes before we ran over a boat and crew belonging to the other vessel, all of whom perished with the exception of one, who caught hold of a rope hanging over the bow.

"Directly the boat was seen, orders were given to stop the engine, which the chief engineer said could not be done, as the ship was fast sinking. In about 30 minutes all the lower fires were out, and, at least, there were six feet of water in the ship, fore and aft. By this time the confusion among the passengers was very great, but they used all efforts to assist the crew in keeping the pumps going, and in lightening the ship forward, for the purpose of endeavouring to get at the leak from inside, which was found to be useless, and numbers of them got into the boats, which were still hanging to the davits. In 45 minutes after this collision I came up from the forehold, and informed the captain that the water was on a level with the lower deck beams, and that it was impossible to get at the leak. I then asked him what he thought would be likely to be the fate of the ship, when he stated his belief to me that there was no hope of saving her. He then told me to see to my boats. On going to those on the port side I found them completely filled with men and women, and no possibility of getting near them. I immediately went to the starboard side, and ordered two of the crew to lower the guard-boat, and asked the captain what his intentions were, who replied that the ship's fate should be his. I then asked him if he would not allow his son to go with me, as I intended to take a boat, but he returned me the answer that he should share his fate. I then jumped into the boat, and was ordered by the captain to cut away the tackle-falls, and drop under the stern. I did so; at which time about twenty persons, as I suppose, jumped overboard, of whom seventeen or eighteen were picked up. Fell in with another boat which had been lowered from the other side, and lightened her of part of her complement, leaving nineteen in her and twenty in my own boat. The last sight we had of the ship her yards were level with the water, and the surface of the sea strewn with human beings who had jumped or fallen overboard, to whom, however, it was impossible for us to render any assistance, and we soon lost sight of all, as the fog continued to be very dense. I then asked the boats' crews whether they were willing to be governed by me, which was unanimously approved, and I was put in complete command of both boats. We were then about 60 miles S.E. of Cape Race. Deeming it my duty, for the safety of all, to take the nearest course for the land, after pulling forty-two hours with nothing to guide us but the run of the sea—which I took to be heading from the southward, and in a thick fog, which lasted all the time—we reached Broad Cove, some 12 miles north of Cape Race. We then proceeded by land to Renewa, which we reached on Friday last. I there obtained and took charge of a small schooner, which was hired by the purser and myself, and proceeded immediately in search of the wreck or her boats. We cruised round until yesterday, in a strong gale of wind from N.E., but could find no trace of ship or boats. No doubt is left on my mind as to the loss of the steamer Arctic."

Passengers saved:—Messrs. C. de Passin, W. A. Young, W. W. Gilbert, J. Bogart, E. F. Mitchell, E. M. Tass, W. Rathbone, J. Hennessy, H. Moore, De Meyer, W. Gihon, jun., J. M. Math, G. Dobbs, and servant to the Duke de Grammont.

Crew saved:—Mr. Geib, purser; Mr. Baahlam, second officer; Mark Graham, fourth officer, and twenty-eight seamen.

PISCATORIAL PROLUSIONS.

By THE HAMPSHIRE FLY-FISHER.

FISH-PRESERVING.

But the waters themselves afford means of self-preservation, at all events, against the use of nets. Stakes armed with stout nails, or tenter-hooks, driven into the bed of the river at short distances, large stones thrown into the deep holes, bundles of thorns sunk in a like way, or the cuttings of a tinner's shop similarly deposited, are all effectual safeguards against the use of the net. And, unless in rivers where the fishery is kept for the purposes of commerce, no net, other than perhaps a casting-net, should, with my consent, be allowed. In the first place, it disturbs the fish; in the second place, it furnishes facilities for their destruction which the most careful proprietor cannot guard against. And this brings me to say a few words about keepers. I have often before asserted, and I here repeat my firm conviction, that the fair angler is the best of all keepers. To keepers themselves, so far as fish are concerned, I have a decided objection. In the outset—

"Quis custodi et ipsos custodes?"

I never pass by a snug cottage by the water side, and see nets hung up to dry, day after day, but stray thoughts will force themselves upon me. How, and how often, and by whom are they used? We all know that no man can deal with them single handed. We all know that the lazy, idle vagabonds, who prefer anything to a regular day's work, the hangers about in the public-house, who have no ostensible occupation, but are commonly reported to be rare hands at snaring a pheasant or wiring a hare, are the readiest persons to help when the drag-net is used. Plenty of beer is to be had, and then comes the evening carouse. It may be the keeper himself likes a glass of ale, and then the fellow-labourers by day become boon companions at night, and are, so to say, sprung up. It may be the keeper may yield to temptation, and appropriate a brace or two of fish to himself. This once done, he is no longer the master, but the servant, and the consequences may be readily anticipated. I have heard of such a party carousing at public-houses, after a day's use of the net, under the pretence of catching jack, when numbers of fine trout have been given away in the tap-room to any one who would pay for beer. I have heard, too, of their returning with thirty or forty brace of fine fish ostensibly to supply their master's table. I wonder how many reached it. I know, too, that there are places, both in London and in the country, where fish are always to be had. In London I have seen them openly exposed for sale, and have been told, on inquiry, by the fishmongers that they have come from waters which I always believed to be closely preserved, and the proprietors of which never sold a fish in their lives. How, then, did they get to London? That, indeed, may be a mystery; but one thing is quite clear—if they went without the keeper's knowledge, his office might well be dispensed with as one of no practical utility. If he were a party to it, he is infinitely more dangerous than the poacher himself; and it must never be forgotten that these depredations almost defy detection—the waters tell no tales. It is otherwise with game; they always have signs of their presence. If, too, I beat a stubble or turnip field, or draw a cover three or four times, and find nothing, I am quite sure that there is no game there, and then the keeper is called to account. But it is otherwise by the water-side. Either the fish won't rise, or they have done rising, or they are lying in the weeds, or something or other is sure to account for the absence of any show. The story always is, "Lord, sir, if you had been with me this morning, when the sun was bright, or last night, when there was a rising, you never did see such a sight; the river is full of fish." &c., &c. I may be very uncharitable, but I was become very sceptical of the truth of these stories; and, as I said before, have strong doubts of the advantages derived from the employment of those by whom they are told. If I thought it necessary to engage any one, either to look after my water, or, if need be, to supply me with fish, the person I should entrust with the duty should be a good angler—one who would feel a pleasure as well as an interest in the discharge of his duty. He should have the same liberty as any other person to fish for himself, and for his own amusement as well as for me; or if I required a constant supply of fish, that might be easily met without duty. There is seldom any difficulty in either diverting a back stream, or turning any little trench or rivulet into a stew, in which fish may be kept ready for use, as the poultry in a farm-yard. But to bring this long yarn to a conclusion. Of three things I am quite sure: the first, that fair angling never injured a river; secondly, that there were many more fish thirty years ago, when there was not half the fuss about preserving them that there is now; and thirdly, that if there were fewer nets, there would not be half the cry out about the destruction of fish.

PROPAGATION OF SALMON.—Some weeks ago we gave an extract from the report of the Commissioners of Fisheries in Ireland, in which a salmon pond, prepared at Kingstown, is described, and where the fry are said to be in a thriving and healthy state. At the same time we took occasion to say that the plan recommended by the commissioners was, we feared, more ingenious than practicable, as the experiment had been tried at Stonehaven precisely in the way pointed out, and had turned out a complete failure. We have made some inquiry into this matter, and a short description of the ponds referred to may not be unacceptable to such of our readers as have turned their attention to this subject. At Stonehaven two ponds were prepared—one fed from the fresh water of the river Covie, and the other from the sea. They were dug in the middle of a large park, and were, of course, immediately beside each other—in fact, there was communication between them by means of a lade or conduit. The fresh water pond was about 300 feet in circumference, and had a constant stream running through it. At the close of the fishing season, from thirty to thirty-six salmon were taken from the sea and conveyed to this pond, where they continued in a lively and thriving state, and where in due time they spawned. The young fish were seen in great numbers in the spring, at which time they had grown to two or three inches in size, when it was thought proper to change their habitat, and they were accordingly allowed to remove themselves to the largest or sea pond, which they did by the conduit previously referred to. The sea pond is upwards of 600 feet in circumference and wasted by a pipe of 12 inches, the water beginning to flow into it at half-tide. It is puddled with clay, and, we believe, causewayed around the margin. Into this receptacle, then, were the young fish received, and here they appeared to thrive for some time; but by-and-by they began to disappear, and in the course of two or three months they had gone, no one knew where. The parent fish were also transferred to the large pond; but they too dwindled to mere shadows of their former selves, in most cases losing five or six pounds in weight, until at last it was resolved to take them from their prison-house, and to look upon the experiment as having entirely failed. It is said that from first to last the sum expended in these operations was not much below £1,500.—Pertshire Advertiser.

THE RIVER FISH OF INDIA.—Fish throughout India is superabundant. The most approved of this class of dietary commodities may be named, in the first place, the betsee or "cock up." This is a very delicate well-flavoured fish, and is not inferior to the codling of this country: it is allowed to rank in Class A in the Bengal catalogue of pisco-gastronomy. Besides the former we have mango fish, the hilsah, snleah, mullet, puthur, ruse, kutler, and other varieties of an inferior kind, with prawns in profusion. The mango fish is esteemed a great luxury. It is about the size of a Trent smelt, and when in season, assumes a brilliant croceate hue. It derives its name from the circumstance of its colour, precisely resembling that of a ripe mango fruit, and arrives at perfection in the month of April, at the time the mango tree begins to fructify. There is a striking feature in this fish, which consists of two tufts of long sprouting flexible antennae, protruding from the anterior portion of the pectoral fins, which precisely resemble the whiskers of a cat. The tubisha, its native name, when soured in vinegar, after the manner of mackerel, eats deliciously, and the hard roes, which are very large, are esteemed by Indian epicures as a very choice dainty, indeed, as the ne plus ultra piscos bon bouche. The hilsah or sable fish is also held in good repute. It runs from three to five pounds in weight, and partakes slightly of the flavour of salmon. When cut into slices and laid down in earthen jars, between green bruised tamarinds, with a proportion of salt, it is looked upon as a great treat by Europeans at their breakfast tables. When served up these slices are broiled on a gridiron, and butter is laid over them, which gives a piquant relish to the taste of the old Bengalee, whose appetite is in many instances exceedingly fastidious. The hilsah is on the latter account generally accepted under the name of the tamarind fish. The roe of the hilsah, like that of the barbel of the Thames, operates when eaten as a violent cathartic, and ought to be avoided. The snleah runs to a large size. I have witnessed them when taken off the "Sandheads" one hundredweight each. The same is a coarse eating commodity, and is used chiefly by the native population, who first thoroughly salt it, and afterwards dry it in the sun. They then convert it into burtah. This when eaten with bread and butter is not so much amiss, but no person, unless he was restricted to a very bad taste, would, if he could avail himself of any other fish preferable to it, count it as a feature in his dietary. The most valuable portions of the snleah are the bladders, which are invariably bought up as soon as the fish are caught, and consigned direct to the Chinese markets. The latter people have held this monopoly in their hands exclusively from time immemorial, and it was only so late as the year 1833, that whilst I was residing at Fnlth, on the shores of the river Hooghly, I discovered this fact. The bladders, when collected in any reasonable quantities, are shipped for Macao, where they undergo the process of purification, and after undergoing the operation of cutting or threading, the material is denominated striped isinglass. This has been sold in Calcutta as high as 12 rupees (24s.) per lb.; whilst the bladders in their raw condition when taken from the fish, may be bought for one anna each (three halfpence), the former weighing about one pound avoirdupois. It is somewhat surprising that the English merchants of Calcutta have not long since taken advantage of the isinglass trade, which promises to prove one of the most steady and lucrative pursuits to which their mercantile attention could be possible directed. The chingaree (Indian prawn) abounds in all the rivers and tanks throughout the country. The smaller samples are boiled and eaten at the breakfast table, but the larger sorts are somewhat coarse, and are, for the most part, carried after a peenial manner, and form a dish named chingaree do piazzur. The latter proves a very favourite picnic both among natives and Europeans. The crab (kankaree) is similarly used. Rice and kutler correspond with the carp and bream of England, while the puthur is equal to our river perch. We have good oysters on the Coromandel coast, equal to the Feversham kinds, that come from the Chilkah Lake. The Chittagong rock oysters are very large and coarse, and present a green, unwholesome complexion. There are some fine turtle taken in the Bay of Bengal, and all the rivers teem with lampreys and eel.

Our Letter-Bag.

GUNS.

Sir,—J. L. is amused with "poor old Bishop's" letter; and I am not the less amused with his (J. L.'s) letter. Bishop, no doubt, wished to draw the attention of the public to the fact that he is a gun-maker; and so he wrote a long letter to the Times—which letter is thought, by old ladies who have sons and grandsons who will shoot, to be a most excellent letter. They are delighted with that part of it where you are instructed to hold your gun as far away from you as possible—"upright, and at arm's length;" not, perhaps, a very convenient or elegant way of proceeding, but quite safe, no doubt. Only I should like to see him (Bishop), and two or three of his friends, of forty years' practice—venerable old chaps!—marching across a moor, carrying their guns in the way he advises. His letter, as I said, is considered a very good one by those who know nothing of shooting. But to all sportsmen it is sheer nonsense; and only proves one thing—viz, that the writer is no sportsman! But if Mr. Bishop has made an attempt to bring himself into notice as a gun-maker, J. L. has also done a bit of quackery on his own account. We all know who J. L. is; and I cannot but think that "my safety," and the wonders he performed at the Red House. "Poor old Bishop" has, at least, the merit of having pushed his own way in the world, in much the same way as J. L. has done. If "poor old Bishop" was once a porter, so was J. L.; for he was once a porter, or shopman, or something of that sort, in Oxford-street; so it is the old case of the pot and the kettle. J. L. should not have lugged in this personal matter. The safety-triggers J. L. speaks of are not, by any means, safe. An inexperienced sportsman is more liable to accident with than without them. In the hands of an experienced sportsman they are of use. They give confidence in loading, and you may carry your gun on full-cock with impunity; but to a novice they are very dangerous. Three several times have I seen my gun discharged by different individuals—novices in shooting—in their attempts to place the gun on half-cock. On one of these occasions I narrowly escaped being shot; and I have resolved never again to hand my guns—safeties—to an inexperienced person. A person cannot learn to shoot by reading books and letters, any more than he can learn to play at cricket by the same means. If a lad wishes to learn how to shoot, with safety to himself and others, he should go out a few times with an old gamekeeper. He will then learn the only really important things—viz, how to load in safety, and how he should, under no circumstances whatever, allow the muzzle of his gun to point in the direction of himself, or of any one else. He must acquire this last accomplishment as a habit; so that, he the gun loaded or not, he can do no harm. A gun may be loaded when you least expect it. Let him never depart from this rule, and his gun may go off by accident as often as it likes; but, as I have said, written instructions are of little use. I would not go out with a man who had learned to shoot by theory. He would be very apt to blow my brains out while he was thinking of his book; and as for Mr. Bishop, or J. L., issuing a set of instructions to sportsmen, the thing is simply ridiculous. There is not one sportsman in a hundred that does not know a great deal more about it than either of them—I am, &c.,

AN OLD SPORTSMAN AND A GUN-MAKER.

MOTHS.

Sir,—"Idleness is the parent of vice." So said our copy-books in our youth; and so says experience in our older age. It is the non-use of carriages which destroys them, and makes them a prey to moths, rust, mould, and rotteness. If your carriage is not in constant use, your man ought to take every opportunity of exposing the cushions and linings to the sun and air, covering the point from the extreme sun by very hot weather—a constant routing-out; for disturbance is the best remedy against all sorts of vermin, winged or legged. Sprinkling the nooks and corners of the carriage with camphor-water has been recommended, and distributing bits of camphor in the cushions and linings Black pepper, except for its sneezing qualities, is a deterrent against moths. But, by all means, have your carriage-house free from all lumber and rubbish, whether wood, rags, cloth, or old timber and sticks; and let the house be frequently whitewashed, with sulphur mixed in the whitewash, as gardeners do their forcing-houses. Slovenly and dirty servants are the ruin of carriages.—I am, &c., UNBAA.

THE USE VERSUS THE ABUSE OF THE SPUR.

Sir,—The remarks of "Amy," in THE FIELD, are perfectly correct; but, as this subject appears to be very imperfectly understood by many of your correspondents, I deem it right to offer a few observations thereon.

It must be admitted that no lady of proper feeling would wantonly torture any animal. Still, as a matter of safety to both, horses should always be sensible that they are under the complete control of their riders, to enforce which, the spur as well as the whip is sometimes equally necessary; and every lady who knows how to ride is able to discriminate between the use and the abuse of either of these equestrian prerogatives.

Your "Squire" and other correspondents do not attempt to prohibit gentlemen from using the spur; why then, Sir, should we, as the weaker sex, be debarred from employing, when requisite, this sometimes necessary aid?

The spur, as an easier method of enforcing obedience, is even more essential to a lady than to a gentleman; and a lady who can ride properly is the best judge when and to what extent, either a separate or simultaneous administration of whip or spur may be required by her horse. Many horses, when accustomed to be ridden with a spur, will not carry their riders safely without. As an instance, I may mention that a valuable and favourite animal of my brother's, on which he had mounted me, was very unmanageable the first time I attempted to ride him; and on this occasion I happened to be without a spur. On the following day I took care to be properly equipped: a few suitable animosities were quite sufficient to enable us to understand our relative positions; and I was never better carried, or with less trouble.

Should a horse require punishment on his right side alone, the whip will suffice; but when a simultaneous operation is likewise needed upon the left, a lady is compelled to use her spur; and even when the left side only requires chastisement, a lady's hand is not so well adapted to the purpose as her heel.

I am quite sure that no gentleman would attempt to spur his horse without she had cause to do so; and I therefore content that every lady should be provided with a spur as a necessary portion of her equestrian chassure. Considerable improvements have been lately made in the construction of ladies' riding-boots and spurs, as adapted to the respective purposes of summer or winter wear. They are supplied by most of the fashionable ladies' boot-makers, a well-finished boot and spur being alike indispensable to the comforts of a lady equestrian, who ought invariably to be properly appointed in every respect; and I feel confident that all humane and accomplished horsewomen will fully concur in the remarks of, Sir, your constant reader, Liscard, Cheshire, Oct. 5, 1854.

DIANA.

JEU DE MOTS.—The initials of the four royal personages of France and England, now on such good terms in political policy and personal amity, singularly enough, form the word Neva, the name of the river on which Russia's capital is situated. The monarchs and their consorts are—Napoleon, Eugenie, Victoria, and Albert. May we suppose, from this coincidence, that the existence of St. Petersburg depends upon the crowned friends, as the city is nourished by and depends upon the river?

Handley Cross. Bradbury and Evans.

Part XVIII. completes this extremely clever work. Captain Doleful, under the hands of Frizwig, mounts "the zephyr scalp and d'Orsay whiskers," and prepares for a siege. Mrs. Jorrocks is more struck with his appearance than Belinda, who, not having seen him for some time, nor understanding the growth of whiskers, is not astonished, or more inclined than before to favour his suit, greatly to the annoyance of Mrs. J.—Bowker and Charley visit Jorrocks at Hoxton, satisfied that the verdict cannot be sustained; and, after a good deal of bullying, get admission to their poor old friend, who is digging potatoes in the garden, his head bound up with a red pocket-handkerchief, to supply the place of his wig, which has been carried away. The visit leads to an application to the Chancellor for a private examination, which is kindly vouchsafed; and his lordship deports, expressing his conviction that Jorrocks is an enthusiast, but not mad, and recommends the doctor to let him go home.

Jorrocks does go home. "He gently opened the door. There sat Mrs. Jorrocks, in a fine red and gold turban, at the top of the table, Belinda with her back to the door, and Captain Doleful in the host's chair, in the act of diving a fork into the breast of a boiled turkey. 'Holla! you old bald-faced baboon!' cried Mr. Jorrocks, an exclamation that caused Captain Doleful to drop his fork, his whiskers to fall from his face, and Mrs. Jorrocks to swoon on the floor.'

WATER POISONED

BY LEADEN
PIPES.

"The above engraving represents accurately a section of a leaden pipe, which was employed for a short time in conveying water from a well on the grounds of Mr. Dick, of Bournemouth, Isle of Wight. The original section of pipe is 8½ in. long, 2½ in. diameter, and 5-16 in. thick. A great part of the internal surface is corroded by the action of the water, but, as shown in the drawing, four deep excavations have been made, and another is shaded out of view by the manner in which the section of the pipe has been cut. The water has cut these deep pits almost through the pipe, and not only upon the portion which we have illustrated, but have formed similar channels throughout the entire length."—Expositor.

N.B.—The corrosive water of the Isle of Wight has no effect on Gutta Percha Tubing. See Testimonial below.

DURABILITY OF GUTTA PERCHA TUBING.

Many inquiries having been made as to the durability of Gutta Percha Tubing, the Gutta Percha Company have pleasure in giving publicity to the following letter from Sir RAYMOND JARVIS, Venetian, Isle of Wight.

(Second Testimonial)

March 10, 1872.

"In reply to your letter received this morning, respecting the Gutta Percha Tubing for pump service, I can state, with much satisfaction, it answers perfectly. Many builders and other persons I have lately examined it, and there is not the least apparent difference since the first laying down, now several years; and I am informed that it is to be adopted generally in the houses that are being erected here."

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.—
An extraordinary and rapid cure of Erysipelas in the leg, after medical aid had failed.

Copy of a Letter from Mrs. Elizabeth Yeates, of the Post-office, Aldwick-road, near Bognor, Sussex, dated January 12th, 1851.

TO PROFESSOR HOLLOWAY.
Sir, I suffered for a considerable period from a revere attack of erysipelas, which at length settled in my leg, and resisted all medical treatment. My sufferings were very great, and I quite despair of any permanent amendment, when I was advised to have recourse to your Ointment and Pills. I did so without delay, and am happy to say the result was eminently successful, for they effected a radical cure of my leg, and restored me to the enjoyment of health. I will ever speak with the utmost confidence of your medicines, and have recommended them to others in this neighbourhood similarly afflicted, who derived equal benefit.

I am, Sir, your obliged and faithful servant,

THE SIEGE OF SEBASTOPOL.

FIELD OFFICE, SATURDAY, 4 A.M.

[. We are in momentary expectation of most important despatches from Sebastopol, and fully hope they will arrive in time for our Second Edition.—En.]

A LETTER dated from "The heights above Sebastopol," Sept. the 23th, contains some interesting particulars relative to the operations of the army previous to investing the place. It says:—"The allied army has at length arrived before Sebastopol. The fourth English division, after two forced marches, arrived yesterday (Sept. 27), and is now encamped before Sebastopol, near a large farm, described on the maps as 'Khutor-Teuzde-otar.' The third division is slightly in the rear to the left, and the second and first divisions lean towards the port of Balaklava, where headquarters are established. The French are encamped in and about the latter place, but will, in time, take up their position on the extreme right, or nearest to the advancing Russians. This day a Russian column issued from the town, and the fourth division, under Sir George Cathcart, advanced to meet it. The Russians then withdrew, with an evident view to entice the English under the range of their heavy cannon. This ruse had, however, no effect, for Sir G. Cathcart retired on the enemy's having declined to accept battle. In consequence of this step of the Russians, the three other British divisions were ordered to advance, and they are still under arms. A great quantity of stores were burned this afternoon by the enemy. From the encampment of the fourth division the whole town and forts can be perceived. The latter are most formidable, but are dominated by the position occupied by the allies. The town is small, and apparently deserted by the greater part of its inhabitants. It has a dreary appearance, unrelieved by shade or trees, owing to the white stone of which the forts and houses are constructed. Figures can be distinguished by the naked eye on the outer forts. The landing of the siege-trains at Balaklava commenced yesterday, (Sept. 27), and will be energetically pursued. Before they can be brought to bear at least four days will pass. Sebastopol will fall, it is expected, in the highest quarters, before twelve days have elapsed. The generalship displayed by the allied commanders in turning the town was admirable. Every effort had been directed by the Russians to render the land forts on the north side impregnable. So demoralised was the enemy after the defeat at Alma, that not the slightest resistance was offered to the advance of the allies, although most favourable positions for harassing their march continually offered themselves. The rivers Belbeck, Katscha, and Chernay, were undefended. No bridges had been destroyed, no difficult roads broken up. The British cavalry had a few trifling skirmishes with enterprising Cossacks, but no engagement of the slightest importance took place. A small barrack was surprised by the Scots Greys, and a major of artillery. Balaklava, where several of our ships, including the Agamemnon, are now lying, was taken, without any serious resistance, on the 25th of September. Our steamers threw in a few shells, and the second battalion of Rifles, attached to the light division, scaled the heights, and fired in a few shots, when the garrison, composed of seventy men, with five small mortars, surrendered. Balaklava will be of great importance to us as a point of communication with the fleet. Its harbour is a great curiosity, and the immense Agamemnon is anchored within a few feet of the quay. An ancient Genoese fortress, now in ruins, and an earthwork, were the only defences of the place."

LATEST FROM THE CRIMEA.

(By International Telegraph.)

The trenches were within 1,500 yards of Sebastopol, on the south.

The Russians have formed sand batteries, and armed them with ships' guns, but the range of the allies' artillery is greater than that of the enemy.

The Moniteur (Paris) publishes the following despatch:

"According to despatches from Constantinople, the siege batteries in front of Sebastopol were in a great part finished on the 3rd, and the bombardment was to commence on the 4th.

"The sources that supply the city with water were in the power of the allies. The Russians were preparing to sink the nine ships they had still afloat."

VIENNA, Friday.

A despatch from the Black Sea, dated the 8th inst., states that the bombardment of Sebastopol commenced on the 5th inst.

Two breaches were made at the Quarantine Fort on the 6th. The supplies of food to the town had been cut off by the allies, and nobody doubted that the place would be carried in a few days.

BATTLE OF THE ALMA.

DEFEAT OF THE RUSSIANS.

OFFICIAL DESPATCHES.

ARRIVAL OF LORD BURGHERSH IN LONDON FROM THE CRIMEA.

Major Lord Burghersh, principal aide-de-camp to General Lord Raglan, commanding the British forces in the Crimea, arrived in town on Sunday morning, at a quarter to seven o'clock, bearing detailed intelligence of the first great action in which the allied forces have been engaged against the Russians. Lord Burghersh brings intelligence down to the 25th of September, at noon, on which day his lordship embarked in her Majesty's war steamer, Fury, Capt. Chambers, then lying near the mouth of the river Katscha, several miles south of the Alma, and within sight of the fortifications of Sebastopol; the advanced guard of the allied forces, at that time, stretching to within two-and-a-half miles of the out-works of the fortress.

Major Loch, of the Indian army, who was on the field of Alma as a spectator, was permitted to return to England with Lord Burghersh. The major is invalided home from India. Mr. Waring, a Queen's messenger, also travelled with Lord Burghersh from Constantinople.

The Fury made the run across the Black Sea to Constantinople in thirty-four hours, arriving at the Turkish capital about midnight on the 26th of September. She left after coaling—an operation in which much valuable time was lost, through the clumsiness of the Turks—on the night of the 27th; and, after a stormy passage, reached Malta about ten o'clock on the night of Monday, the 2nd of October. Only two-and-a-half hours were consumed in coaling at Malta, and the Fury again put to sea about midnight on the 2nd inst., two hours after the Nil, the ordinary French mail packet, had taken her departure from the same port. The distance from Malta to Marseilles was run—under some disadvantages of weather, which rendered it necessary to round the island of Sardinia—in eighty hours, the Fury steaming into the harbour of Marseilles at eight o'clock on Friday morning, the 6th inst. In less than an hour Lord Burghersh had disembarked, and secured a special train, by which he travelled to Valence, posting thence to Lyons. Another special train was here chartered by his lordship to bring him on to Paris; but as the exigencies of foreign railways do not admit of any disturbance of the ordinary traffic, so in this instance, on overtaking one of the usual trains, his lordship's carriage was attached thereto, and his arrival in Paris thus delayed until five o'clock on Saturday evening, the 7th inst. Lord Burghersh, after having had a brief interview with Lord Cowley, her Majesty's ambassador at the French Court, came on to Boulogne, where he arrived shortly after twelve o'clock at night (Saturday). His lordship crossed from Boulogne to Dover in one of the beautiful steamers of the South Eastern Railway Company, and, leaving Dover at four o'clock, arrived at London-bridge station at half-past six (Sunday). A carriage was in waiting to convey his lordship to Downing-street, where he alighted at the office of the Minister for the War Department. His Grace the Duke of Newcastle was instantly sent for, and arrived in less than half an hour; though, we regret to add, suffering from severe indisposition. It will be observed in the subjoined despatches that only one officer of the Guards Brigade is returned as "killed"—Mr. Horace Cust, of the Coldstream Guards. This gallant young man is the youngest son of Captain the Hon. Peregrine Francis Cust—a cousin of the youthful Earl Brownlow—and a nephew of the Duke of Buccleuch.

BATTLE OF THE ALMA.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Oct. 8, 1854, 8½ a.m.

Major the Lord Burghersh arrived this morning with a despatch from General the Lord Raglan, G.C.B., to his Grace the Duke of Newcastle, of which the following is a copy:—

Head-quarters, Katscha River, Sept. 23, 1854.

MY LORD DUKE,—I have the honour to inform your Grace that the allied troops attacked the position occupied by the Russian army, behind the Alma, on the 20th instant; and I have great satisfaction in adding that they succeeded, in less than three hours, in driving the enemy from every part of the ground which they had held in the morning, and in establishing themselves upon it.

The English and French armies moved out of their first encampment in the Crimea on the 10th, and bivouacked for the night on the left bank of the Bulganac, the former having previously supported the advance of a part of the Earl of Cardigan's brigade of light cavalry, which had the effect of inducing the enemy to move up a large body of dragoons and Cossacks, with artillery.

On this, the first occasion of the English encountering the Russian force, it was impossible for any troops to exhibit more steadiness than did this portion of her Majesty's cavalry.

It fell back upon its supports with the most perfect regularity, under the fire of the artillery, which was quickly silenced by that of the batteries I caused to be brought into action.

Our loss amounted to only four men wounded. The day's march had been most wearisome, and, under a burning sun, the absence of water, until we reached the insignificant but welcome stream of the Bulgaue, made it to be severely felt.

Both armies moved towards the Alma the following morning, and it was arranged that Marshal St. Arnaud should assail the enemy's left by crossing the river at its junction with the sea, and immediately above it, and that the remainder of the French divisions should move up the heights in their front, whilst the English army should attack the right and centre of the enemy's position.

In order that the gallantry exhibited by her Majesty's troops, and the difficulties they had to meet may be fairly estimated, I deem it right, even at the risk of being considered tedious, to endeavour to make your Grace acquainted with the position the Russians had taken up.

It crossed the great road about two miles and a half from the sea, and is very strong by nature.

The bold and almost precipitous range of heights, of from 350 to 400 feet, that from the sea closely border the left bank of the river, here ceases, and formed their left, and turning thence round a great amphitheatre or wide valley, terminates at a salient pinnacle where their right rested, and whence the descent to the plain was more gradual. The front was about two miles in extent.

Across the mouth of this great opening is a lower ridge at different heights, varying from 60 to 150 feet, parallel to the river, and at distances from it of from 600 to 800 yards.

The river itself is generally fordable for troops, but its banks are extremely rugged, and in most parts steep; the willows along it had been cut down, in order to prevent them from affording cover to the attacking party, and, in fact, everything had been done to deprive an assailant of any species of shelter.

In front of the position on the right bank, at about 200 yards from the Alma, is the village of Boulionk, and near it a timber bridge, which had been partly destroyed by the enemy.

The high pinnacle and ridge before alluded to was the key of the position, and, consequently, there the greatest preparations had been made for defence.

Half way down the height, and across its front, was a trench of the extent of some hundred yards, to afford cover against an advance up the even steep slope of the hill. On the right, and a little retired, was a powerful covered battery, armed with heavy guns, which flanked the whole of the right of the position.

Artillery, at the same time, was posted at the points that best commanded the passage of the river and its approaches generally.

On the slopes of these hills (forming a sort of table-land) were placed dense masses of the enemy's infantry, whilst on the heights above was his great reserve, the whole amounting, it is supposed, to between 45,000 and 50,000 men.

The combined armies advanced on the same alignment, her Majesty's troops in contiguous double columns, with the front of two divisions covered by light infantry and a troop of horse-artillery, the 2nd Division, under Lieutenant-General Sir De Lacy Evans, forming the right, and touching the left of the 3rd Division of the French army, under his Imperial Highness Prince Napoleon, and the Light Division under Lieutenant-General Sir George Brown, the left; the first being supported by the 3rd Division, under Lieutenant-General Sir Richard England, and the last by the 1st Division, commanded by Lieutenant-General his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge.

The 4th Division, under Lieutenant-General Sir George Cathcart, and the cavalry, under Major-General the Earl of Lucan, were held in reserve to protect the left flank and rear against large bodies of the enemy's cavalry, which had been seen in those directions.

On approaching to near the fire of the guns, which soon became extremely formidable, the two leading divisions deployed into line, and advanced to attack the front, and the supporting divisions followed the movement. Hardly had this taken place when the village of Boulionk, immediately opposite the centre, was fired by the enemy at all points, creating a continuous haze for 300 yards, obscuring their position, and rendering a passage through it impracticable. Two regiments of Brigadier-General Adious' brigade, part of Sir De Lacy Evans' division, had, in consequence, to pass the river at a deep and difficult ford to the right, under a sharp fire, whilst his first brigade, under Major-General Pennecfather, and the remaining regiment of Brigadier-General Adams crossed to the left of the conflagration, opposed by the enemy's artillery from the heights above, and pressed on towards the left of their position, with the utmost gallantry and steadiness.

In the meanwhile the Light Division, under Sir George Brown, effected the passage of the Alma in his immediate front. The banks of the river itself were, from their rugged and broken nature, most serious obstacles, and the vineyards through which the troops had to pass, and the trees which the enemy had felled, created additional impediments, rendering every species of formation, under a galling fire, nearly an impossibility. Lieutenant-General Sir George Brown advanced against the enemy under great disadvantages.

In this difficult operation he nevertheless persevered, and the 1st Brigade, under Major-General Codrington, succeeded in carrying a redoubt, materially aided by the judicious and steady manner in which Brigadier-General Buller moved on the left flank, and by the advance of four companies of the Rifle Brigade, under Major Norcott, who promises to be a distinguished officer of light troops.

The heavy fire of grape and musketry, however, to which the troops were exposed, and the losses consequently sustained by the 5th, 23rd, and 33rd Regiments, obliged this brigade partially to relinquish its hold.

By this time, however, the Duke of Cambridge had succeeded in crossing the river, and had moved up in support, and a brilliant advance of the brigade of Foot Guards, under Major-General Bentinck, drove the enemy back, and secured the final possession of the work.

The Highland Brigade, under Major-General Sir Colin Campbell, advanced in admirable order and steadiness up the high ground to the left, and in co-operation with the Guards; and Major-General Pennecfather's brigade, which had been connected with the right of the Light Division, forced the enemy completely to abandon the position they had taken such pains to defend and secure.

The 95th Regiment, immediately on the right of the Royal Fusiliers in the advance, suffered equally with that corps an immense loss.

The aid of the Royal Artillery in all these operations was most effectual. The exertions of the field-officers and the captains of troops and batteries to get the guns into action were unceasing, and the precision of their fire materially contributed to the great results of the day.

Lieutenant-General Sir Richard England brought his division to the immediate support of the troops in advance, and Lieutenant-General the Hon. Sir George Cathcart was actively engaged in watching the left flank.

The nature of the ground did not admit of the employment of cavalry under the Earl of Lucan, but they succeeded in taking some prisoners at the close of the battle.

In the detail of these operations, which I have gone into as far as the space of a despatch would allow, your Grace will perceive that the services in which the general and other officers were engaged were of no ordinary character; and I have great pleasure in submitting them for your Grace's most favourable consideration.

The mode in which Lieutenant-General Sir George Brown conducted his division under the most trying circumstances demands the expression of my warmest approbation. The demands to which his division was subjected, and the difficulties fire to which he contended against, afford no small proof that his best energies were applied to the successful discharge of his duty.

I must speak in corresponding terms of Lieutenant-General Sir De Lacy Evans, who likewise conducted his division to my perfect satisfaction, and exhibited equal coolness and judgment in carrying out a most difficult operation.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge brought his division into action in support of the Light Division with great ability, and had for the first time an opportunity of showing the enemy his devotion to her Majesty and to the profession of which he is so distinguished a member.

My best thanks are due to Lieutenant-General Sir R. England, Lieutenant-General the Honourable Sir George Cathcart, and Lieutenant-General the Earl of Lucan, for their cordial assistance wherever it could be afforded; and I feel it my duty especially to recommend to your Grace's notice the distinguished conduct of Major-General Bentinck, Major-General Sir Colin Campbell, Major-General Pennecfather, Major-General Codrington, Brigadier-General Adams, and Brigadier-General Buller.

In the affair of the previous day, Major-General the Earl of Cardigan exhibited the utmost spirit and coolness, and kept his brigade under perfect command.

The manner in which Brigadier-General Strangways directed the artillery, and exerted himself to bring it forward, met my entire satisfaction.

Lieutenant-General Sir John Burgoyne was constantly by my side, and rendered me, by his counsel and advice, the most valuable assistance; and the commanding royal engineer, Brigadier-General Tylden, was always at hand to carry out any service I might direct him to undertake.

I deeply regret to say that he has since fallen a victim to the cholera, as has Major Wellesley, who was present in the affair of the previous day notwithstanding that he was then suffering from serious illness. He had, during the illness of Major-General Lord de Ros, acted for him in the most efficient manner. I cannot speak too highly of Brigadier-General Estcourt, Adjutant-General, or of Brigadier-General Airey, who, in the short time he has conducted the duties of the Quartermaster-General, has displayed the greatest ability, as well as aptitude for the office.

I am much indebted to my Military Secretary, Lieutenant-Colonel Steele, Major Lord Burghersh, and the officers of my personal staff, for the zeal, intelligence, and gallantry, they all, without exception, displayed.

Lieutenant Derriman, R.N., the Commander of the Canadoc, accompanied me during the whole of the operation, and rendered me an essential service, by a close observation of the enemy's movements which his practised eye enabled him accurately to watch.

I lament to say that Lieutenant-Colonel Lagondie, who was attached to my head-quarters by the Emperor of the French, fell into the enemy's hands on the 19th, on his return from Prince Napoleon's division, where he had obligingly gone at my request, with a communication to his Imperial Highness.

This misfortune is deeply regretted, both by myself and the officers of my personal staff.

The other officer placed with me under similar circumstances, Major Vico, afforded me all the assistance in his power, sparing no exertion to be of use.

I cannot omit to make known to your Grace the cheerfulness with which the regimental officers of the army submitted to most unusual privations.

My anxiety to bring into the country every cavalry and infantry soldier who was available, prevented me from embarking their baggage animals, and these officers have with them at this moment nothing but what they can carry; and they, equally with the men, are without tents or covering of any kind.

I have not heard a single murmur. All seem impressed with the necessity of the arrangement; and they feel, I trust, satisfied that I shall bring up their hot horses at the earliest moment.

The conduct of the troops has been admirable. When it is considered that they have suffered severely from sickness during the last two months; that, since they landed in the Crimea, they have been exposed to the extremes of wet, cold, and heat; that the daily toil to provide themselves with water has been excessive, and that they have been pursued by cholera to the very battle-field, I do not go beyond the truth in declaring that they merit the highest commendation.

In the ardour of attack they forgot all they had endured, and displayed that high courage and gallant spirit for which the British soldier is ever distinguished; and under the heaviest fire they maintained the same determination to conquer as they had exhibited before they went into action. I should be wanting in my duty, my Lord Duke, if I did not express to your Grace, in the most earnest manner, my deep feeling of gratitude to the officers and men of the Royal Navy for the invaluable assistance they afforded the Army upon this as on every occasion, where it could be brought to bear upon our operations.

They watched the progress of the day with the most intense anxiety; and as the best way of evincing their participation in our success, and their sympathy in the sufferings of the wounded, they never ceased, from the close of the battle till we left the ground this morning, to provide for a sick and wounded, and to carry them down to the beach—a labour in which some of the officers even volunteered to participate, an act which I shall never cease to recollect with the warmest thankfulness.

I mention no names, fearing I might omit some who ought to be spoken of; but none who were associated with us spared any exertion they could apply to so sacred a duty.

Sir Edmund Lyons, who had charge of the whole, was, as always, most prominent in rendering assistance, and providing for emergencies.

I enclose the return of killed and wounded. It is, I lament to say, very large; but I hope, all circumstances considered, that it will be felt that no life was unnecessarily exposed, and that such an advantage could not be achieved without a considerable sacrifice.

I cannot venture to estimate the amount of the Russian loss. I believe it to have been great, and such is the report in the country.

The number of prisoners who are not hurt is small; but the wounded amount to 800 or 900. Two general officers, Major-Generals Karganoff and Shokanoff fell into our hands. The former is very badly wounded.

I will not attempt to describe the movements of the French Army—that will be done by an able hand—but it is due to them to say that their operations were eminently successful, and that, under the guidance of their distinguished commander, Marshal St. Arnaud, they manifested the utmost gallantry, the greatest ardour for the attack, and the high military qualities for which they are so famed.

This despatch will be delivered to your Grace by Major Lord Burghersh, who is capable of affording you the fullest information, and whom I beg to recommend to your especial notice.—I have, &c.,

P.S.—I enclose a sketch of the field of battle.

His Grace the Duke of Newcastle, &c. &c. &c.

Head Quarters, Alma River, Sept. 22, 1854.

GENERAL ORDER.—No. 1.

The Commander of the Forces congratulates the troops on the brilliant success that attended their unvalued efforts in the battle of the 20th inst., on which occasion they carried a most formidable position, defended by large masses of Russian infantry, and a most powerful and numerous artillery.

Their conduct was in unison with that of our gallant allies, whose spirited and successful attack of the left of the heights occupied by the enemy cannot fail to have attracted their notice and admiration.

The Commander of the Forces thanks the army most warmly for its gallant exertions. He witnessed them with pride and satisfaction, and it will be his pleasing duty to report, for the Queen's information, how well they have earned her Majesty's approbation, and how gloriously maintained the honour of the British name.

Lord Raglan condole most sincerely with the troops on the loss of so many gallant officers and brave men, whose memory it will be a consolation to their friends to feel, will ever be cherished in the annals of our army.

War Department, October 8, 1854, 8½ o'clock, a.m.

The Duke of Newcastle has received private letters from Lord Raglan, expressing his great regret that the harassing duties imposed upon the troops, by the operations after the battle of Alma, had prevented the nominal returns of the killed and wounded of the non-commissioned officers and privates being made out in the different regiments in time to be sent with the despatches now published.

The Duke of Newcastle expects them by an early mail, and they shall be published the moment they are received.

A GUARDSMAN'S LETTER.

The following is a letter received by a sergeant of the Guards from a comrade:—

"Camp near the river Alma, Sept. 21.

"My Dear John,—Agreeably to promise I now write to you. God, in his Almighty goodness, has been very kind to me. After a day of very hard marching, hard fighting, and a night of very severe pain, I now sit under the shelter of a hayrick to attempt to give you an account of our first engagement with the Russians (a bloody one it was). Well, my dear fellow, we landed on the shores of the Crimea on the 14th of September, and on the 19th we advanced towards Sebastopol about twelve miles; our advanced outposts had a slight skirmish with the enemy's outposts the same evening; we marched about 8 a.m., and came in sight of the enemy's entrenched position about 12 noon, and I can assure you it was the finest position any army ever occupied; nearly all of it was of nature's forming, except the one that the Light Division and the brigade of the Guards took, these being the light, heavy (or 1st), 2nd, and one brigade of the 3rd Division. About 1 o'clock p.m. the Light Division formed line and advanced on the enemy's position, the Guards being in rear of the Light Division at quarter distance columns, and the Rifles out, at extended order, in front of the Light Division.

"The position of the enemy was defended by about 90 or 100 guns.

"They commenced playing their guns on the Light Division at a distance of about 700 or 800 yards, and the spent balls came 'carruing' (this is a Scotch phrase) among our (Guards') feet like cricket-balls.

"Well, we kept advancing till within about 200 or 300 yards of the river, when we formed line and lay down. During the time the Light Division was crossing the river and advancing to the enemy's intrenchments. When we were lying down I assure you the enemy had got our range to a nicety and kept dropping the shot amongst us. No joke! After that we got up and advanced through a vineyard towards the river, where the grape and canister were flying about us like hail. However, we got through the vineyard without all being cut down. I cannot tell, but we thought of old England's glory, and kept dashing on regardless of anything that came in our way. Plenty of the men kept picking up grapes (not grapes) and eating them as we went through the vineyard. When our regiment got across we were in confusion; but we kept still advancing up the brow of the hill. When we got up to the top the 23rd Fusiliers (who had been handled most severely by the enemy's fire) were ordered to retire; this they did in great disorder through our ranks, throwing us into more confusion than before; but, brave fellows, they did their share of the work, and we felt that our turn had come. Well, we retired and got forced up, and advanced to about fifty yards of the battery, when I received a musket shot in the left arm. I had my left side to the enemy, and I am only surprised the ball did not go through my body; it did not touch the bone, it went right through the fleshy part of the arm; but I thank God it is no worse. What took place after I was wounded I cannot say but from hearsay, but I believe our regiment took the intrenchment at the bayonet point. The Russians fought very well considering they were under cover, but the accounts would not face us in open ground. Our regiment was opposed to the 31st Regiment of Imperial Guard, and fine strapping fellows they are.

"All the nobility and gentry from Sebastopol and its environs had erected a grand stand on a high position in rear of the Russian army, reminding one of Epsom races. I believe they came on purpose to see the Russians drive the allied armies into the sea, but through the blessing of God, the giver of all victories, we turned the tables, and sent them scampering over the hill, like a lot of frightened deer. There is a Russian general taken prisoner; he says that they expected to hold their position fourteen or twenty days, but we let them see that they had not the Turks to deal with, but British and French soldiers, and we took the position in three hours and a half. The Russian general said that when he was going against the English he thought he was going against men, but he found them to be perfect devils, wishing to get up to the cannon's mouth, regardless of everything. I went over the field the next morning, and of all the sights I ever saw that was the worst. There lay before me the dead, the dying, and the wounded; frightful to look at. I think for one Englishman there were four Russians; the Russians were lying behind their trenches four and six deep. All the wounded are going on board ship to-day. I believe we are going to Scutari."

"Scutari (Constantinople), Sept. 23.

"P.S.—We have got to Scutari at last, but I thought we should not have brought any men at all, as the men kept during the voyage quickly dying of their wounds; there were only three surgeons on board to dress and look after 600 men. My dear fellow, Raglan has a great deal to answer for, in not having sufficient medical men to attend the wounded soldiers who risked their lives and bled for their country's honour. I never had my arm looked at by a doctor from the day I received the wound till yesterday, but thank God, from previous experience, I was able to look after it myself, and the wounds of others also. During our stay on board the ship many a bright man lost his life through want of medical attendance; we threw about 50 or 100 overboard coming down the Black Sea; but it is just as bad at Scutari. We disembarked on the 26th, and we have had neither tea, rations, nor anything except half a pound of bread.

"There was a draft of 300 men to have sailed to-day for the Crimea, but it was countermanded. I hear there are no more troops wanted in the Crimea, as Sebastopol is all but down, but I cannot vouch for the truth of it.

"We lost about 165 in our regiment, and the British army about 1,200 or 1,300 altogether. Give my love to all, and God bless you. Good bye."

THE FIELD AFTER THE BATTLE OF ALMA.

The field of battle was crowded on the 21st with officers from the fleet, carrying flasks of brandy-and-water, visiting the wounded, and giving them all the relief in their power. The doctors from the ships were on shore all night giving medical aid. So many soldiers from each regiment were told off to bury the dead. The Russians were buried outside the mounds; the English and French inside. There was great spoil on the field—coats, dresses, swords, guns, rifles, &c., &c., and in some instances large sums of money. Everybody brought off some memento—either a sword, casque, or musket. The Highland bonnets, I regret to say, formed quite a heap.

It appears that a certain class of visitors made a profitable day's work by visiting the field of battle; almost every one "found" something. One I heard boast that he had picked up nine revolvers, and £50; and one, a Maltese, is reported to have realised upwards of £150 in gold. Coats, boots, &c., were all taken off by pillagers, and in many cases the gold lace ripped off the uniforms of the dead.

All muskets that have been found have been destroyed, except those taken off by visitors as trophies, and few ships but have many mementos of this sort. My share of the spoil is a helmet with an eagle shot through completely by a musket-ball, and a sword, quite enough to carry a long distance on a warm day.

A large plan was found in the house Lord Raglan slept in at Katcha, and in Menschikoff's carriage were found the full particulars of the English army, their strength, &c., showing how well the spies in the English camp must have done their treacherous work. In this despatch Prince Menschikoff assures the Emperor that he could make good the defences of the Alma for three weeks against 100,000 men. They were carried by the allies, of whom not half that number were actually engaged, in three hours. It is confidently reported that Menschikoff was suffering severely from illness during the battle, so much so that he had to be supported. There are also reports of his having been wounded—one account says in the feet, another, in the hands.

NON-OFFICIAL ACCOUNTS OF THE BATTLE OF THE ALMA.

Banks of the Alma, Sept. 19.

Last night orders were given by Lord Raglan that the troops should strike tents at daybreak, and that all tents should be sent on board the ships of the fleet. Our advance had been determined upon, and it was understood that the Russian light cavalry had been sweeping the country of all supplies up to a short distance of our lines and outlying pickets.

At three o'clock in the morning the camp was roused by the reveil, and all the 30,000 sleepers woke into active life.

The French, in advance on our right, were up betimes, and the camp fires of the allied armies, extending for miles along the horizon and mingling with the lights of the ships, almost anticipated the morning. The order of march was as follows:—

7,000 Turkish infantry, under Suleiman Pasha, moved along by the sea-side; next to them came the divisions of Generals Bosquet, Canrobert, Forey, and Prince Napoleon. Our order of march was about four miles to the right of their left wing, and as many behind them.

The right of the allied forces was covered by the fleet, ready to shell the enemy should they threaten to attack our right, and commanding the land for nearly two miles from the shore.

Everything not absolutely indispensable was sent on board ship. The naval officers and the sailors worked indefatigably, and cleared the beach as fast as the men deposited their baggage and tents there. At last the men fell in, and the march of the campaign began.

Hares were started in abundance, and afforded great sport to the men whenever they halted, and several were furiously hunted down among the lines of men. The soil is hard and elastic, and was in excellent order for artillery.

After a march of an hour a halt took place for fifty minutes, during which Lord Raglan, accompanied by a very large staff, Marshal St. Arnaud, Generals Bosquet, Forey, and a number of French officers rode along the front of the columns. The men spontaneously got up from the ground, rushed forward, and column after column rent the air with three thundering English cheers. It was a good omen. As the Marshal passed the 55th Regiment he exclaimed, "English, I hope you will fight well to-day!" "Hope!" exclaimed a voice from the ranks, "sure you know we will!" The troops presented a splendid appearance. At last, the smoke of burning villages and farm-houses announced that the enemy in front were aware of our march. Many sick men fell out, and were carried to the rear. It was a painful sight—a sad contrast to the magnificent appearance of the army in front, to behold litter after litter borne past to the carts, with the poor sufferers who had dropped from illness and fatigue.

Presently, from the top of a hill, a wide plain was visible, beyond which rose a ridge darkened here and there by masses which the practised eye recognised as cavalry. It was our first sight of the enemy. On the left of the plain, up in a recess formed by the inward sweep of the two ridges, lay a large village in flames, right before us was a neat white house unburnt, though the outhouses and farm-yard were burning. This was the Imperial post-house of Bouljanak, just twenty miles from Sebastopol.

A small stream ran past us, which was an object of delight to our thirsty soldiers, who had now marched more than eight miles from their camp. The house was deserted and gutted; only a picture of a saint, bunches of herbs in the kitchen, and a few household utensils were left; and a solitary peasant, which soon fell a victim to a revolver, stalked sadly about the threshold. After a short halt for men and horses by the stream, the army moved on again. The cavalry (about 500 men of the 3th Hussars, the 11th Hussars, and 13th Light Dragoons) pushed on in front, and on arriving about a mile beyond the post-house we clearly made out the Cossack Lancers on the hills in front. Lord Cardigan threw out skirmishers in line, who covered the front at intervals of ten or twelve yards from each other. The Cossacks advanced to meet us in like order, man for man, the steel of their long lances glittering in the sun. They were rough-looking fellows, mounted on sturdy little horses, but the regularity of their order and the celerity of their movements showed they were regulars, and by no means despicable foes. As our skirmishers advanced, the Cossacks halted at the foot of the hill. Their reserves were not well in sight, but from time to time a clump of lances rose over the summit of the hill and disappeared. Lord Cardigan was eager to try their strength, and permission was given him to advance somewhat nearer; but as he did so, dark columns of cavalry came into view in the recesses of the hills, and it became evident that if our men charged up such a steep ascent their horses would be blown, and that they would run a risk of being surrounded and cut to pieces by a force of three times their number. Lord Lucan therefore ordered the cavalry to halt, gather in their skirmishers, and retire slowly. At every fifty paces our cavalry faced about to receive the Cossacks if they prepared to charge. Suddenly one of the Russian cavalry squares opened—a spurt of white smoke rose out of the gap, and a round shot, which pitched close to my horse, tore over the column of our cavalry behind, and rolled away between the ranks of the riflemen in the rear, just as they came in view of the cavalry. In another instant a second gun bowed right through the 11th Hussars, and knocked over a horse, taking off his rider's leg above the ankle. Another and another followed, tearing through our ranks, so that it was quite wonderful so few of the cavalry were hit. Meantime Captain Maude's artillery galloped over the billock, but were halted by Lord Raglan's order at the base, in rear of the cavalry on the left flank. This was done probably to entice the Russians further down the hill. Meantime, our cavalry were drawn up as targets for the enemy's guns, and had they been of iron they could not have been more solid and immovable. The Russian gunners fired admirably; they were rather slow, but their balls came bounding along, quite visible as they passed in right lines from the centre of the cavalry columns. After some thirty rounds from the enemy our artillery opened fire. Their round-shot ploughed up the columns of the cavalry, who speedily dispersed into broken lines, wheeling round and round with greatadroitness to escape the six and nine-pound balls. Our shells were not so successful, but one, better directed than the rest, burst right in the centre of a column of light infantry, whom the Russians had advanced to support their cavalry. Our fire was so hot, the service of the guns so quick, that the enemy retired in about fifteen minutes after we opened on them. While this affair was going on, the French had crept up on the right, and surprised a body of Russian cavalry with a round from a battery of nine-pounders, which scattered them in all directions. We could count six dead horses on the field near the line of fire. It is not possible to form an accurate notion of the effect of our fire, but it must have caused the Russians a greater loss than they inflicted on us. We lost six horses, and four men were wounded. Two men lost their legs. The others, up to yesterday, though injured severely, were not in danger. One of the wounded men, a sergeant in the 11th Hussars, rode coolly to the rear with his foot dangling by a piece of skin to the bone, and told the doctor he had just come to have his leg dressed. Another wounded trooper behaved with equal fortitude, and refused the use of a litter to carry him to the rear, though his leg was broken into splinters. It was strange, in visiting the scene where the horses lay dead, that the first feeling produced on the spectator—when the horror of seeing the poor animals ripped open by shells from chest to loin, as though it was done by a surgeon's knife, had subsided—was that Sir E. Landseer, in his picture of "War," must have seen one of the animals before us; the glaring eye-ball, the distended nostril, the gnashed teeth, are all true to life. When the Russians had retired beyond the heights, orders were given to halt and bivouac for the night, and our tired men set to work to gather the weeds for fuel. As soon as the rations of rum and meat were served out, the casks were broken up, and the staves served to make fires for cooking aided by nettles and long grass. At night the watchfires of the Russians were visible on our left. Great numbers of stragglers came up during the night, most of them belonging to the 4th Division. The night was cold and damp, the watchfires were mere flashes, which gave little heat, and barely sufficed to warm the rations. All night arabas were arriving and soldiers who had fallen out or got astray came up to the sentries to find their regiments. Sir George Brown, Sir D. L. Evans, the brigadier generals and staff officers went about among their divisions and brigades ere the men lay down, giving directions for the following day, and soon after dusk the regiments were on the ground, wrapped up in great-coats and blankets to find the best repose they could after the day's exertions.

THE GRAND VICTORY OVER THE RUSSIANS.

Camp at the Alma, Sept. 20.

On the morning of the 20th, ere daybreak, the whole of the British force was under arms. They were marshalled silently; no bugles or drums broke the stillness, but the hum of thousands of voices rose loudly from the ranks, and the watch-fires lighted up the lines of the camp as though it were a great town. When dawn broke it was discovered that the Russians had retired from the heights, but had left their camp-fires burning. The troops lay on their arms for about an hour, while the generals were arranging the order of our advance. Lord Raglan had made his dispositions the previous evening, and the generals of division, Sir George Brown, Sir De Lacy Evans, Sir R. England, and Sir G. Cathcart, aided by their brigadiers-general, went from colonel to colonel of each regiment under their command, giving them instructions with respect to the arrangement of their men in the coming struggle.

Early in the morning the troops were ordered to get in readiness, and at half-past six o'clock they were in motion. It was a lovely day; the heat of the sun was tempered by the sea breeze. The fleet was visible at a distance of four miles, covering the ocean as it was seen between the hills, and we could make out the steamers on our right as close to the shore as possible.

The Generals St. Arnaud, Bosquet, and Forey, attended by their staff, rode along in front of the lines, with Lord Raglan and his generals at second halt, and were received with tremendous cheering. At 1.20 we saw the steamers in shore (French) commence throwing shells up to a height in front, and the enemy replied by a heavy fire, but the distance was too great for any effectual result. The action became general at 1.45 on the part of the French and Turks, who carried the heights on the right, which were but weakly protected. At 2.30 we advanced down the slope towards the valley of the Alma, above which rose the lines of the enemy. As we advanced they set fire to Boulonk, a village at the base of the descent to the valley at our side, and, covered by the smoke, opened a tremendous fire of 9 and 12-pounder guns from their earthwork batteries. Our artillery replied with shot, shell, and rockets, while the men advanced through a storm of bullets, and rushed across the stream—the Light Division on the right, the Second Division next, the First Division in the centre, and the third supporting them. Amid a most tremendous fire, the Guards rushed up the hill and stormed the heaviest battery. Once they were driven back, but the Duke rallied them and led them to the charge in person. Sir G. Brown had a horse shot under him. Sir De Lacy Evans led on his division under the very thickest of the mitraille. The Russians threw spherical shot, marked with a cross, which inflicted terrible wounds, and their practice, when they got the range, was excellent. At 3 o'clock the French had moved up solid columns of infantry to the heights on our right, and turned the guns against the enemy. Our men struggled through the flames of the village and the river under a continuous roll of artillery. At 4 o'clock they charged in three divisions up the heights. The Light Division suffered fearfully, particularly the 7th and 23rd Regiments, which Sir George Brown led in person. The 55th, 95th, and 30th also suffered severely. The Rifles, second battalion, though the first under fire, suffered least of all, as they got over before the enemy caught the range.

At 5 o'clock the Russians were flying in every direction, ploughed up by the splendid fire of our guns, leaving on the field an immense number of dead, three guns, drums, and ammunition. The want of cavalry prevented our getting more prisoners or capturing a greater number of guns.

FURTHER DETAILS.

Heights above Alma, Sept. 21.

The order in which our army advanced was in columns of brigades in deploying distance, our left protected by a line of skirmishers of cavalry and of horse artillery. Our line of march on the 20th was towards the right of our former base, and brought us in contact with the French left, under Prince Napoleon, it being understood that Sir De Lacy Evans's division, on our extreme right, should act in concert with that of his Royal Highness the Prince, which was of course furthest from the sea. As soon as we had ascertained the position of our allies accurately, the whole line, extending itself across the campaign country for some five or six miles, advanced. At the distance of two miles we halted to obtain a little time to gather up our rear, and then the troops steadily advanced in grand lines like the waves of the ocean, with our left frittered away, as it were, into a foam of skirmishers under Colonel Lawrence and Major Norcott of the Rifle Brigade, 2nd battalion, covered by squadrons of the 11th and 8th Hussars, and portions of the 4th, 13th Light Dragoons and 17th Lancers. This was a sight of inexpressible grandeur, and for the first time one was struck with the splendid appearance of our infantry in line in the distance. Red is the colour after all, and the white slashings of the breast of the coat and the cross belts, though rendering a man conspicuous enough, give him an appearance of size which other uniforms do not produce. The dark French columns on our right looked very small compared to our battalions, though we knew they were quite as strong; but the marching of our allies, laden as they were with all their packs, &c., was wonderful—the pace at which they went was really "killing."

The scheme of operations concerted between the generals, and chiefly suggested to Lord Raglan, it was said, by Marshal St. Arnaud and General Canrobert, was, that the French and Turks on our right were to force the passage of the river, a rivulet of the Alma, and establish themselves on the heights over the stream at the opposite side, so that they could enfilade the position to our right and opposite to our left and centre. The Alma is a tortuous little stream, which has worked its way down through a red clay soil, deepening its course as it proceeds seawards, and which drains the steppe-like lands on its right bank, making at times pools and eddies too deep to be forded, though it can generally be crossed by waders who do not fear to wet their knees. It need not be said that the high banks formed by the action of the stream in cutting through the soil are sometimes at one side, sometimes at another, according to the sweep of the stream.

At the place where the bulk of the British army crossed the banks are generally at the right side, and vary from two and three to six or eight feet in depth to the water; where the French attacked the banks are generally formed by the unvaried curve of the river on the left-hand side. Along the right or north bank of the Alma are a number of Tartar houses, at times numerous and close enough to form a cluster of habitations deserving the name of a hamlet, at times scattered wide apart amid little vineyards, surrounded by walls of mud and stone of three feet in height. The bridge over which the post road passes from Bouljanak to Sebastopol runs close to one of these hamlets—a village, in fact, of some fifty houses. This village is approached from the north by a road winding through a plain nearly level till it comes near to the village, where the ground dips, so that at the distance of 300 yards a man on horseback can hardly see the tops of the nearer and more elevated houses, and can only ascertain the position of the stream by the willows and verdure along its banks. At the left or south side of the Alma the ground assumes a very different character—smooth where the bank is deep, and gently elevated where the shelves of the bank occur, it proceeds for a few yards at a moderate height above the stream, pierced here and there by the course of the winter's torrents, so as to form small ravines, commanded, however, by the heights above. It was in these upper heights that the strength of the Russian position consisted. A remarkable ridge of mountain, varying in height from 500 to 700 feet, runs along the course of the Alma on the left or south side with the course of the stream, and assuming the form of cliffs when close to the sea. This ridge is marked all along its course by deep gullies, which run towards the river at various angles, and serve, no doubt, to carry off the floods produced by the rains and the melting of the winter snows on the hills and tablelands above. If the reader will place himself on the top of Richmond-hill, dwarf the Thames in imagination to the size of a Hampshire rivulet, and imagine the lovely hill itself to be deprived of all vegetation, and protracted for about four miles along the stream, he may form some notion of the position occupied by the Russians, while the plains on the north or left bank of the Thames will bear no inapt similitude to the land over which the British and French armies advanced, barring only the verdure and freshness. At the top of the ridges, between the gullies, the Russians had erected earthwork batteries, mounted with 32 and 24-pounder brass guns, supported by numerous field-pieces and howitzers. These guns enfiladed the tops of the ravines parallel to them, or swept them to the base, while the whole of the sides up which an enemy, unable to stand the direct fire of the batteries, would be forced to ascend, were filled with masses of skirmishers armed with an excellent two-groove rifle, throwing a large, solid, conical ball with force at 700 and 800 yards, as the French learnt to their cost. The principal battery consisted of an earthwork of the form of two sides of a triangle, with the apex pointed towards the bridge below, and the sides covering both sides of the stream, corresponding with the bend in the river below it, at the distance of 1,000 yards, while, with a fair elevation, the 32-pounders threw, as we saw very often, beyond the houses of the village to the distance of 1,400 and 1,500 yards. This was constructed on the brow of a hill about 600 feet above the river, but the hill rose behind it for another fifty feet before it dipped away towards the road. The ascent of this hill was enfiladed by the fire of three batteries of earthwork on the right, and by another on the left, and these batteries were equally capable of covering the village, the stream, and the slopes which led up the hill to their position. In the first battery were thirteen 32-pounder brass guns of exquisite workmanship, which told only too well. In the other batteries were some twenty-five guns in all. It was said the Russians had 100 guns on the hills and 40,000 men (forty battalions of infantry 1,000 strong each, of the 16th, 31st, 32nd, and 52nd Regiments.) We were opposed principally to the 16th and 32nd Regiments, judging by the number of dead in front of us. Menschikoff commanded the army in chief, the left was under Gortschakoff, a relative of the diplomatist, and the right under Bodachoff, the Military Governor of Sebastopol. It seems strange that an Admiral should be appointed to command an army, but strange things do happen in Russia. Large masses of cavalry, principally lancers and heavy dragoons, manœuvred, on the hills on the right of the Russians, and at last descended the hills, crossed the stream, and threatened our left and rear. As we came near the river our left wing was thrown back, in order to support our small force of cavalry, and a portion of our artillery was pushed forward in the same direction. Our danger in this respect was detected by the quick eye of Sir George Brown, and he gave the order for the movement of the artillery almost as soon as he caught sight of the enemy's cavalry, and just as we were coming to the village. As I have already said, our plan of operations was that the French should establish themselves under the fire of the guns on the heights on the extreme of the enemy's left. When we were about three miles from the village, the French steamers ran in as close as they could to the bluff of the shore at the south side of the Alma, and presently we saw them shelling the heights in splendid style, the shells bursting over the enemy's squares and batteries, and finally driving them from their position on the right, within 3,000 yards of the sea.

The French practice commenced about half-past 12 o'clock, and lasted for about an hour and a half. We could see the shells falling over the batteries of the enemy, and bursting right into them; and then the black masses inside the works broke into little specks, which flew about in all directions; and when the smoke cleared away there were some to be seen strewn over the ground. The Russians answered the ships from the heights, but without effect. A powder tumbril was blown up by a French shell; another shell fell by accident into an ambuscade which the Russians had prepared for the advancing French, and at last they withdrew off from the sea-side, and confined their efforts to the defence of the gullies and heights beyond the fire of the heavy guns of the steamers. At 1 o'clock we saw the French columns struggling up the hills, covered by a cloud of skirmishers, whose fire seemed most deadly. Once, at sight of a threatening mass of Russian infantry in a commanding position above them, who fired rapid volleys among them, the French paused, but it was only to collect their skirmishers, for as soon as they had formed, they ran up the hill at the pas de charge, and at once broke the Russians, who fled in disorder, with loss up the hill. We could see men dropping on both sides, and the wounded rolling down the steep. At 1.50 our line of skirmishers got within range of the battery on the hill, and immediately the Russians opened fire at 1,200 yards with effect, the shot ploughing through the open lines of the Riflemen, and falling into the advancing columns behind. Shortly before this, dense volumes of smoke rose from the river, and drifted along to the eastward, rather interfering with the view of the enemy on the left of our position. The Russians had set the village on fire. It was a fair exercise of military skill—was well executed—took place at the right time, and succeeded in occasioning a good deal of annoyance. Our troops halted when they neared this village, their left extending beyond it by the verge of the stream; our right behind the burning cottages, and within range of the batteries. It is said the Russians had taken the range of all the principal points in their front, and placed twigs and sticks to mark them. In this they were assisted by the post-signboards on the road. The Russians opened a furious fire on the whole of our line, but the French had not yet made progress enough to justify us in advancing. The round shot whizzed in every direction, dashing up the dirt and sand into the faces of the staff of Lord Raglan, who were also shelled severely, and attracted much of the enemy's fire. Still Lord Raglan waited patiently for the development of the French attack. At length an aide-de-camp came to him and reported the French had crossed the Alma, but they had not established themselves sufficiently to justify us in an attack. The infantry were therefore ordered to lie down, and the army for a short time was quite passive, only that our artillery poured forth an unceasing fire of shell, rockets, and round shot, which ploughed through the Russians, and caused them great loss. They did not waver, however, and replied to our artillery manfully, their shot falling among our men as they lay, and carrying off legs and arms at every round. Lord Raglan at last became weary of this inactivity. His spirit was up—he looked around, and saw men on whom he knew he might stake the honour and fate of Great Britain by his side, and, anticipating a little in a military point of view the crisis of action, he gave orders for our whole line to advance. Up rose these serried masses, and passing through a fearful shower of round, case shot, and shell, they dashed into the Alma, and “floundered” through its waters, which were literally torn into foam by the deadly hail. At the other side of the river were a number of vineyards, and, to our surprise, they were occupied by Russian riflemen. Three of the staff were here shot down, but, led by Lord Raglan in person, the rest advanced cheering on the men. And now came the turning point of the battle, in which Lord Raglan, by his sagacity and military skill, probably secured the victory at a smaller sacrifice than would have been otherwise the case. He dashed over the bridge, followed by his staff. From the road over it, under the Russian guns, he saw the state of the action. The British line, which he had ordered to advance, was struggling through the river and up the heights in masses, firm indeed, but mowed down by the murderous fire of the batteries, and by grape, round shot, shell, canister, case shot, and musketry, from some of the guns of the central battery, and from an immense and compact mass of Russian infantry. Then commenced one of the most bloody and determined struggles in the annals of war. The 2nd Division, led by Sir D. Evans in the most dashing manner, crossed the stream on the right. The 7th Fusiliers, led by Colonel Yea, were swept down by files. The 55th, 30th, and 95th, led by Brigadier Pennefather, who was in the thickest of the fight, cheering on his men, again and again were checked indeed, but never drew back in their onward progress, which was marked by a fierce roll of Minié musketry; and Brigadier Adams, with the 41st, 47th, and 49th, bravely charged up the hill, and aided them in the battle. Sir George Brown, conspicuous on a grey horse, rode in front of his Light Division, urging them with voice and gesture. Gallant fellows! they were worthy of such a gallant chief. The 7th, diminished by one-half, fell back to reform their columns lost for the time; the 23rd, with eight officers dead and four wounded, were still rushing to the front, aided by the 19th, 33rd 77th, and 88th. Down went Sir George in a cloud of dust in front of the battery. He was soon up, and shouted, “23rd, I'm all right; be sure I'll remember this day,” and led them on again, but in the shock produced by the fall of their leader, the gallant regiment suffered terribly while paralysed for a moment. Meantime the Guards, on the right of the Light Division, and the Brigade of Highlanders were storming the heights on the left. Their line was almost as regular as though they were in Hyde-park. The battle of the Alma was won. It was won with a loss of nearly 3,000 killed and wounded on our side. This list will appear in a few days. The Russians' retreat was covered by their cavalry, but if we had had an adequate force we could have captured many guns and multitudes of prisoners.

When Lord Raglan and his staff and the Duke of Cambridge rode round to the top of the hill, the troops cheered them with a thrilling effect—a shout of victory—which never can be forgotten. The enemy, who were lying in the distance, might almost have heard its echoes as it rolled among the hills. Our men had indeed done their work well, for the action, which commenced at 1.25 on our part, was over about 4 p.m. In fact, the actual close continuous fighting did not last two hours!

The Russian regiments engaged against us, judging from the numbers on the caps and buttons of the dead and wounded, were the 11th, 12th, 16th, 17th, 18th, 31st, 32nd, 33rd, and some of the Imperial Guard. The Russian regiment consists of four battalions, and each battalion may be said to be 650 strong. The soldiers were mostly stout, strong men. Several of the regiments, 32nd and 16th, for example, wore a black leather helmet, handsomely mounted with brass, and having a brass cone on the top, with a hole for the reception of a tuft, feather, or plume; others wore simply a white linen foraging cap. They were all dressed in long drab coats with brass buttons, bearing the number of the regiment. These coats fitted loosely, were gathered in at the back by a small strap and button, descended to the ankles, and seemed stout comfortable garments, though the cloth was coarse in texture; the trousers, of coarse blue stuff, were thrust inside a pair of Wellington boots, open at the top, to admit of their being comfortably tucked down; the boots were stout, well made, and serviceable. Their knapsacks astonished our soldiers. On opening them, each was found to contain the dress uniform coat of the man, blue or green, with white facings, and slashes like our own, a pair of clean drawers, a clean shirt, a pair of clean socks, a pair of stout mitts, a case containing a good pair of scissors marked “Sarun,” an excellent penknife with one large blade, of Russian manufacture, a ball of twine, a roll of leather, wax, thread, needles and pins, a hairbrush and comb, a small looking-glass, razor, strap, and soap, shoe-brushes, and hickory. The general remark of our men was that the Russians were very “clean soldiers,” and certainly the men on the field had white fair skins to justify the expression. Each man had a loaf of dark brown bread, of a sour taste and disagreeable odour, in his knapsack, and a linen roll, containing a quantity of brown coarse stuff broken up into lumps and large grains, which is crushed biscuit or hard granulated bread prepared with oil. This, we were told by the prisoners, was the sole food of the men. They eat the bread with onions and oil; the powder is “reserve” ration; and if they march they may be for days without food, and remain hungry till they can get fresh loaves and more “bread-stuff.” It is perfectly astounding to think they can keep together on such diet—and yet they are strong, muscular men enough. The surgeons remarked that their tenacity of life was very remarkable. Many of them lived with wounds calculated to destroy two or three ordinary men. I saw one of the 32nd Regiment on the field just after the fight. He was shot right through the head, and the brain protruded in large masses at the back of the head and from the front of the skull. I saw with my own eyes the wounded man raise his hand, wipe the horrible mass from his brow, and proceed to struggle down the hills towards the water! Many of the Russians were shot in three or four places; few of them had only one wound. They seemed to have a general idea that they would be murdered: possibly they had been told no quarter would be given, and several deplorable events took place in consequence. As our men were passing by, two or three of them were shot or stabbed by men lying on the ground, and the cry was raised that “the wounded Russians” were firing on our men. There is a story, indeed, that one officer was severely injured by a man to whom he was in the very act of administering succour as he lay in agony on the field; he this as it may, there was at one time a near chance of a general massacre taking place, but the men were soon controlled, and confined themselves to the pillage which always takes place on a battle-field. One villain with a red coat on his back, I regret to say, I saw go up to a wounded Russian, who was rolling on the earth in the rear of the 7th Regiment, and before he could say a word he discharged his rifle right through the wretched creature's brains. Colonel Yea rode at him to cut him down, but the fellow excused himself by declaring the Russian was going to shoot him. This was the only single act of inhumanity I saw perpetrated by this army flushed with victory and animated by angry passions, although the wounded enemy had unquestionably endangered their lives by acts of ferocious folly. Many of the Russians had small crosses and chains fastened round their necks. Several were found with Korans in their knapsacks—most probably recruits from the Kasan Tartars. Many of the officers had portraits of wives or mistresses, of mothers or sisters, inside their coats. The privates wore the little money they possessed in purses fastened below their left knees, and the men, in the eager search after the money, often caused the wounded painful apprehensions that they were about to destroy them. Last night all these poor wretches lay in their agony; nothing could be done to help them. The groans, the yells, the cries of despair and suffering, were a mournful commentary on the exultation of the victors and on the joy which reigned along the bivouac fires of our men. As many of our wounded as could be possibly picked up in darkness set in were conveyed on stretchers to the hospital tents. Many of the others were provided with blankets and covered as they lay in their blood. The bawls of the regiments worked in the most cheerful and indefatigable manner, hour after hour, searching out and carrying off our wounded. Long after night had closed faint lights might be seen moving over the frightful field, marking the spots where friendship directed the steps of some officer in search of a wounded comrade, or where the pillager yet stalked about on his horrid errand. The attitudes of some of the dead were awful. One man might be seen resting on one knee, with the arms extended in the form of taking aim, the brow compressed, the lips clenched—the very expression of firing at an enemy stamped on the face and fixed there by death; a ball had struck this man in the neck. Physiologists or anatomists must settle the rest. Another was lying on his back with the same expression, and his arms raised in a similar attitude, the Minié musket still grasped in his hands undischarged. Another lay in a perfect arch, his head resting on one part of the ground and his feet on the other, but the back raised high above it. Many men without legs or arms were trying to crawl down to the waterside. Some of the dead lay with a calm, placid smile on their face, as though they were in some delicious dream.

Of the Russians one thing was remarkable. The prisoners are generally coarse, sullen, and unintelligent-looking men. Death had emboldened those who fell, for the expression of their faces was altogether different. The wounded might have envied those who seemed to have passed away so peacefully.

The soldiers are all shaven cleanly on the chin and cheek; only the moustache is left, and the hair is cropped as close to the head as possible. The latter is a very convenient mode of wearing the hair in these parts of the world. The officers (those of superior rank excepted) are barely distinguishable from the men, so far as uniform is concerned, but the generals wore sashes and gold epaulettes. The subalterns were merely a lace shoulder-strap, instead of the cloth one of the privates. Most of them spoke French, and the entreaties of the wounded to be taken along with us as the officers moved up the hill were touching in the extreme. The poor fellows had a notion that our men would murder them if the eye of the officer was removed from them. An old general, who sat smiling and howing on a bank with his leg broken by a round shot, seemed principally concerned for the loss of his gold snuff-box. This, I believe, has since been restored to him. The men say they were badly handled, and had no general to direct them. Menschikoff lost his head in a figurative sense. The officers displayed great gallantry, and the men fought with a dogged courage characteristic of the Russian infantry, but they were utterly deficient in plan and dash. The officers and gentlemen who were with his Lordship on that memorable day were, as far as I can ascertain, Lord Burghersh, Colonel Somerset, Lieut. Carzon, A.D.C., Lieutenant Derriman, R.N., acting as naval A.D.C., who rode close to his lordship throughout the day on a little pony; Colonel Steele, Mr. Rounine, Deputy Judge-Advocate; Col. Dixon, M. Vico, Chef d'Escadron; Mr. Kinglelake, Captain Waagman, Lieutenant Macdonald, 93rd, Provost-Marshal; Brigadier-General Strangways, Captain Gage, Captain Adye, Brigadier-General Tylden (since dead of cholera) and staff, Lieutenant Ewart, Sir John Burgoyne and staff, Lieutenant Stopford, R.E., A.D.C., Capt. Burke, 88th Regiment, A.D.C., and Lieutenant Nasmyth, extra A.D.C., Brigadier-General Estcourt, Lieutenant de Morel, Lieut. Teesdale (wounded), Mr. Filder, Commissary-General; Mr. Leslie, Life Guards (wounded); Dr. Prendergast, Dr. Elliott, Veterinary-Surgeon Stockley, Colonel Airey, Quartermaster-General; Drs. Hall and Dunbrock, Captain Kingscote, Lieutenant Calthorpe, Captain Nolan, Captain Sankey, Captain Wetherall, Captain Woodford, Major Blane, Captain Weare (wounded).

Balaklava, Sept. 28, 1854.

MY LORD DUKE,—I have the greatest satisfaction in acquainting your Grace that the army under my command obtained possession of this important place on the 26th inst. and thus established a new and secure base for our future operations.

The allied armies quitted their position above the Alma on the morning of the 23rd, and moved across the Katscha, where they halted for the night, and on the following day passed the Belbeck.

It then appeared that the enemy had established a work which commanded the entrance of the river, and debarred its use for the disembarkation of troops, provisions, and material; and it became expedient to consider whether the line of attack upon the north side should not be abandoned, and another course of operation adopted.

It having, after due deliberation, been determined by Marshal St. Arnaud and myself that we should relinquish our communication with the Katscha, and the hope of establishing it by the Belbeck, and endeavour by a flank march to the left to go round Sebastopol and seize Balaklava; the movement was commenced on the 25th, and completed on the following day by the capture of this place by her Majesty's troops, which led the advance. The march was attended with great difficulties. On leaving the high road from the Belbeck to Sebastopol, the army had to traverse a dense wood, in which there was but one road that led in the right direction it was necessary to take. That road was left, in the first instance, to the cavalry and artillery; and the divisions were ordered to march by compass, and make a way for themselves as well as they could; and, indeed, the artillery of the Light Division pursued the same course as long as it was found to be possible; but as the wood became more impracticable, the batteries could not proceed otherwise than by getting into the road above-mentioned.

The head-quarters of the army, followed by several batteries of artillery, were the first to clear the forest, near what is called, in Major Jarvis's map, Mackenzie's Farm, and at once found themselves on the flank and rear of a Russian division, on the march to Baské-Seraï.

This was attacked as soon as the cavalry, which had diverged a little into a bye and intricate path, could be brought up. A vast quantity of ammunition and much valuable baggage fell into our hands, and the pursuit was discontinued after about a mile and a half, it being a great object to reach the Tschernaya that evening.

The Russians lost a few men, and some prisoners were taken, amongst whom was a captain of artillery.

The march was then resumed by the descent of a steep and difficult defile into the plains, through which runs the Tschernaya river, and this the cavalry succeeded in reaching shortly before dark, followed in the course of the night by the Light, First, Second, and Third Divisions; the Fourth Division having been left on the heights above the Belbeck till the following day, to maintain our communication with the Katscha.

This march, which took the enemy quite by surprise, was a very long and toilsome one, and, except at Mackenzie's farm, where two wells, yielding a scanty supply, were found, the troops were without water, but they supported their fatigues and privations with the utmost cheerfulness, and resumed their march to this place on the morning of the 26th.

As they approached Balaklava nothing indicated that it was held in force; but as resistance was offered to the advance of the Rifle Brigade, and guns were opened from an old castle as the head of the column showed itself on the road leading into the town, I deemed it prudent to occupy the two flanking heights by the Light Division and a portion of Captain Brandling's troop of horse-artillery on the left; movements terminated by the surrender of the place, which had been occupied by very inconsiderable numbers of the enemy.

Shortly after we had taken possession, we were greeted by Captain Mends, of the Agamemnon, and soon after by Sir Edmund Lyons himself.

His co-operation was secured to us by the activity and enterprise of Lieutenant Maxse, of her Majesty's ship Agamemnon, who reached my camp on the Tschernaya, on the night of the 25th, with despatches, and who volunteered immediately to retrace his steps through the forest, and to communicate to Sir Edmund the importance I attached to his presence at the mouth of the harbour of Balaklava the next morning, which difficult service (from the intricacy of the country, infested by Cossacks) he accomplished so effectually, that the admiral was enabled to appear off this harbour at the very moment that our troops showed themselves upon the heights.

Nothing could be more opportune than his arrival, and yesterday the magnificent ship that bears his flag entered this beautiful harbour; and the admiral, as has been his invariable practice, co-operated with the army in every way possible.

We are busily engaged in disembarking our siege train and provisions, and we are most desirous of undertaking the attack of Sebastopol without the loss of a day. I moved up two divisions yesterday to its immediate neighbourhood, when I was enabled to have a good view of the place; and Lieutenant-General Sir John Burgoyne and General Bisot, the French Chef de Génie, are occupied in reconnoitring it closely to-day.

The march of the French army on the 25th was still more fatiguing and prolonged than ours. Being behind our columns, they could not reach Tschernaya till the next day, and I fear must have suffered sadly from want of water.

I regret to have to acquaint your Grace that Marshal St. Arnaud has been compelled, by severe illness, to relinquish the command of the army. I saw him on the 25th, when he was suffering very much, and he felt it is duty to resign the next morning. I view his retirement with deep concern, having always found in him every disposition to act in concert with me. He has since become much worse, and is I fear in a very precarious state.

Fortunately he is succeeded by an officer of high reputation, General Camrobert, with whom I am satisfied I shall have great pleasure in acting, and who is equally desirous of maintaining the most friendly relations with me.

I have, &c.,

(Signed) RAGLAN.

His Grace the Duke of Newcastle, &c. &c.

MISCELLANEOUS ANECDOTES, INCIDENTS, AND MEMORANDA.

THE LANDING PLACE.—The scene on the neck of land close to Lake Kamishli, which had been the landing-point and site of encampment of our force, presented after their departure a curious aspect. Hundreds of sacks of flour, which had been captured at Eupatoria, and left behind from absence of means of transport, were being carried off by the numerous transport boats as a lawful prize. Sailors were galloping wildly about on half-tamed colts, which had been brought in when too late to be laden, or condemned as too weak to be employed; others were smothering each other with flour, to the intense gratification of the assembled natives; officers' saddle-bags and baggage, which had been left behind for want of arabas, were being guarded and shipped by some kindhearted skipper; the Leander's crew were engaged in taking off ammunition; fragments of biscuit and pork covered the beach; Cossacks were hovering about on the farther side of the lake, or stationed on the numerous mounds commanding the coast; whilst from the fifty or sixty unlevelled graves, where reposed our poor fellows who had laded on the enemy's ground only to succumb to the fatal seeds of cholera sown at Varna, and from the decomposing carcases of horses drowned in landing, there arose a stench which, had the army remained but one day longer, might have been fatal to its very existence. As it is, on the day the army left—on the very day—cholera broke out in the ranks; but the change of air, and the excitement of the approaching operations, will, it is hoped, check its further ravages.

A NEW KHAN FOR THE CRIMEA.—EUPATORIA.—The allied troops on the 15th of Sept. took possession of this town. Captain the Hon. — Drummond, of her Majesty's steam-frigate Retribution, was the first to land a company, the commandant of the town having fled, as also his adjutants. The inhabitants accused them of having tried to burn the storehouses of the town, and not being successful, of having thrown water upon the corn, in order to spoil it. Eupatoria is occupied by 450 English marines and about 200 French soldiers. Two hours after landing, Captain Drummond returned on board the French corvette La Mouette, where he consulted with the French director of the department for military information, who is a Pole, and ex-major in the French army. Measures were adopted for establishing an authority in the country. Two ships were left in the harbour, and boats were sent to the storehouses to help the Tartars, who had undertaken the duties of police. The enthusiasm shown by these people for the allies is wonderful. The French director of the information department had brought a Tartar priest with him, who had been staying at Varna for the last three years to escape from Russian oppression. When the Tartars saw him return with the allies, their exultation and acclamations knew no bounds, to the great astonishment of the English and French. They all (young and old) rushed forward to kiss his hands, feet, and the hem of his robe. After having put matters in order, the allied troops re-embarked to join the armies, which were marching towards the river Alma. All authority has been left in the hands of the Tartars. The French have, however, sent there some Tartars of distinction, who had been living in Turkey. Amongst them is Prince Achmet Gueray, a descendant of Ghenghis Khan, the last Khan of Tartary. This prince is infirm, having met with an accident in his youth, and being unable to walk; but he is full of intelligence, and only thirty-five years of age.

AT THE BATTLE OF ALMA, Lord Raglan and his staff were for a long time greatly exposed to the enemy's fire. It was there that the French General Thomas was wounded. [He is now at Constantinople.] He was speaking to Lord Raglan, requesting two pieces of British light artillery to storm a position, when a ball struck him in the thigh, and knocked him off his horse. During the action, Lieut. Colonel Lagondie, Lord Raglan's official French aide-de-camp, was captured by a party of Cossacks, while carrying a message to St. Arnaud.

THE DEEDS OF VALOUR told of as performed at Alma may stand beside those of ancient or modern times. The Hon. Captain Monck, of the 7th, was pierced by a ball, which he felt was his death-wound, but, with expiring energy, he drove his sword through the heart of the first advancing foe, while a blow from his strong arm levelled another with the ground. The 7th Fusiliers lost their colours once, and regained them. The 55th, 53rd, 7th, and Guards suffered most. A corporal of the 23rd found himself alone in the enemy's battery, and actually bayoneted three men before assistance came to him. He was at once promoted to be sergeant, which, we hope, is only a step to further advancement. Beyond the battery was a scene of utter Muscovite rout. One Russian officer lay dead, with a little dog sitting between his legs, a position from which no persuasion could move him. He had been mortally wounded, and had given his gold watch to a soldier who kindly gave him a draught of water. Another, quite a boy, lay with his hands clasped in the attitude of prayer; near him lay one only wounded, who spoke French, and there nestled in his bosom a little kitten, which seemed unwilling to leave him. He said that their force had consisted in all of 55,000 men, 40,000 infantry, 9,000 cavalry, and 6,000 artillery, and that Menschikoff himself had chosen the ground. He said that three battalions, i.e., 12,000 men of the garrison of Sebastopol, were with the army. "We could have held it," says a captured Russian general, "against fair soldiers; but we had not calculated on being attacked by red devils."

RUSSIAN GRATITUDE.—Nothing could have been more gallant than the conduct of the English soldiers at Alma, and that they should have advanced in spite of such a fearful shower of balls, must be recorded as one of the bravest things any army ever did. Men who went through the Peninsular campaign say that they never saw more dead in so small a space, except on the night before Talavera. It was indeed a sickening sight to see how thickly the dead were strewn, some lying on their faces, others with their arms raised in the air. The Russians who were lying there wounded, were attended by our men, just as if they had been our countrymen; and this too, notwithstanding that some of them had been so devilish as to take the water that had been given them, and then shoot two of their benefactors! It was owing to this that all the Russian muskets had their stocks knocked off on the night of the battle.

A NUMBER OF CURIOUS FEATS and acts of courage are mentioned, which merit remark. Amongst them is the following:—The English had just planted a camp flag under the fire of the enemy, in order to mark out the position to be taken by a division which was advancing. A Russian left his ranks, ran up to the Englishman, killed him, and took the flag. Another English non-commissioned officer, observing the movement of the Russian, ran in pursuit of him, and shot him with his revolver, recovered the flag, and ran as fast as he could back to his rank, on reaching which he dropped down dead, having received no less than seven balls in his body before he fell.

THE DEFEATED RUSSIANS who crowded the field at Alma in all the contortions of the last agony were principally soldiers of the 16th and 32nd Regiments. They were mostly very small-sized men, though stout, muscular, and active looking. From their appearance there was scarcely a dozen above the age of 25, and the majority were much younger. Not a single officer was among their dead, at least none that we could recognise as such. They wore short grey great-coats, blue coats, blue trousers, with a narrow red band, and stout leather boots, reaching almost to their knees. Their stout white leather cross belts were scrupulously clean, as was all the rest of their uniform. On their heads were handsome black leather helmets, bound with brass, and brass chin plates, with a spiked top. In front was a large handsome imperial eagle, also in brass, surmounted with a Russian inscription, and number of the regiment. Each man also bore the regimental number marked on the cloth of his uniform. Their firelocks were old and almost worthless, at least compared to our Minié. The stocks were of a light dry wood, coloured over—their barrels about six inches longer than ours, but not rifled. Their bayonets were wretched, our men broke them in their hands. They had large convenient knapsacks of undressed cow hide, rough-looking, light and serviceable. All these were instantly broken open by our men, and the contents eagerly scrutinised. Each had in it two coarse cotton shirts, two pairs of socks, a pair of cloth mitts, a strong pair of leather boots, and one pair of trousers. All these were arranged in excellent order and beautifully clean. I have seldom seen linen cleaner. Nearly every other man's knapsack contained a pack of cards. No hooks were found except four or five Korans in Turkish and Arabic, proving what I previously heard, that we should find many Mahometans in the ranks of the Russians.

A RUSSIAN GENERAL was captured at the camp. He had heard the firing, and, perfectly confident that the action must have resulted in a repulse, came with a single attendant to congratulate—as he believed—Prince Menschikoff upon his victory. To his intense surprise he was made prisoner, and brought in by Sergeant Trotter of the Coldstream Guards, who was on duty at the outposts.

OFF THE ALMA RIVER, Sept. 22.—A signal just made by the Agamemnon to the staff on shore is as follows:—"A clever Polish marine, who has just escaped from his ship, says that the Russians were so completely beaten that had the army been able to follow they could have taken the forts of Sebastopol."

MEDICAL STAFF FOR THE ARMY IN THE EAST.—In the course of September forty additional medical officers reached the army from England; thirty-four others are on their way; fourteen have embarked this week, and others are nearly ready for embarkation.—Medical Times and Gazette.

NEAR THE BELBECK there was a chateau, belonging to a Russian nobleman. It was charmingly situated, with pretty gardens full of fruit. Lord Raglan made it his head-quarters for the night, but the advanced guard had got into it before-hand, and made sad devastation in it. Some of the men brought into camp a mirror, about six feet high, the frame of which was soon forming part of a camp-fire.

THE COLOURS of the Scots Fusilier Guards had twenty-six bullets through them. The staff of the colours was broken; but Mr. Lindsay held fast, and escaped without a wound.

THE ARTILLERY behaved with their usual gallant and indomitable courage; one of the first of the artillery guns that attempted to cross the river Alma had one of the wheels of the gun-carriage completely destroyed by the shot from the Russian guns, while the officers and men were up to their middles in the water. Nothing daunted by their position, and the heavy fire kept upon them, they promptly set to work, and in an incredibly short space of time attached another wheel to the gun-carriage, and marched forward to the scene of action almost as soon as the others. One of the officers of the Royal Artillery killed in action was serving the gun as No. 3 gunner at the time he was killed.

ALL ACCOUNTS AGREE in describing the Russian position, and especially that portion of it to which the English were opposed, as being almost impregnable. Sir G. Brown, a good judge, declares that in the Peninsular struggle the English had encountered no such position. Prince Menschikoff's confident opinion of it is known from his intercepted despatches, in which he promises to hold it against 100,000 until the cold weather set in, when he would assume the offensive and drive us into the sea. One account says the despatch was somewhat to this effect:—"Although the English are invincible at sea, they are not to be feared on land; but the French will cause a heavy struggle. The allied armies are not, however, to be feared, as the fortified camp can withstand any attacking force three weeks, and certainly half as long as Sebastopol itself."

PRINCE MENSCHIKOFF'S CARriage and COACHMAN were taken, and have been sent to Constantinople; the former is publicly exposed at Tophane. In the carriage were found the full particulars of the English army, their strength, &c., showing how well the spies in the English camp must have done their treacherous work. The scene after the battle is described as most harrowing. The Russian dead and wounded far outnumbered ours, but no difference was made between friends and enemies by those who had the disagreeable duty of burying the dead and removing the wounded. Men who went through the Peninsular campaign say that they never saw more dead in so small a space, except on the night after Talavera.

OUR MEN BEHAVEN with great humanity to the Russian wounded, furnishing them with water from their own canteens. This conduct, it is said, met with the basest ingratitude. One man deliberately fired at and wounded an artilleryman, who had just given him some water to quench his burning thirst. An indignant guardsman instantly clubbed the scoundrel. An eye-witness mentions an instance of a Russian officer who was being assisted from the field, where he had lain for two days severely wounded, by two marines. He solicited some water to drink, and after he had been lifted down and had drunk enough, as one of the marines was in the act of turning round to pick him up again, the ungrateful villain shot him dead. His comrade amply repented the cowardly act; for, seizing a small spar that the cot was strung to, he beat out the rascally Russian's brains. Several of the wounded Russians fired at our wounded who were lying disabled near them. In consequence of acts of this sort, all the muskets of the prisoners and wounded were broken off at the stock, and their cartridges taken from them. The Russians who crowded the field in all the contortions of the last agony were principally soldiers of the 16th and 32nd Regiments. One officer, says an eye-witness, lay dead, with a little dog sitting between his legs, a position from which no persuasion could move him. He had been mortally wounded, and had given his gold watch to a soldier who kindly gave him a draught of water. Another, quite a boy, lay with his hands clasped in the attitude of prayer. Beyond the battery was a scene of utter Muscovite rout, very few English having fallen after its destruction; the ground was covered with dead, dying, and wounded, arms and knapsacks lying about in the wildest confusion. The Russians were buried outside the mounds; the English and French inside. Many of our dead were hurried within the fieldwork by the Rev. H. P. Wright, principal chaplain to the expedition.

OUR GUNNERS got hold of the baggage of some general officer and his staff, for they were soon laden with embroidered Hussar jackets, pelisses, and garments of various kinds. They also got a quantity of jewellery and watches; and some, more lucky than the rest, got hold of the general's luncheon-basket, and feasted on wild boar, washed down with champagne.

THE FOLLOWING is an extract from a letter from Dr. McDermott, staff-surgeon, which has been received by Captain Latham, of the 43rd Foot, quartered in Carlisle Castle. The letter is dated from the Bivouac of the Allied Army, near Alma, September 22:—"Our guns were about a hundred yards in advance of me, but the smoke prevented my seeing anything, and in a few minutes a man of the 11th Hussars was carried to the rear wounded, his left foot being hit off by a cannon shot. This was the first gunshot wound I saw. Three of the 13th Light Dragoons were wounded, oddly enough, each in the foot. The enemy retreated, and so the affair ended." Another surgeon says:—"I have seen some curious wounds from the course taken by the balls. One man, who fell by my side, rowed out, 'Oh, Doctor, I am killed,' but on tearing open his clothes, I found the ball had not gone deeper than the skin. A cannon ball passed close to me, and over the head of a man who was lying on the ground; you could see the round shot passing you like swift bowling at cricket. I took a Russian prisoner, and gave him up. I also found a Russian aide-de-camp dead, and relieved him of his despatches. We are sleeping in the open air in our cloaks. I saw seven officers of one regiment lying dead together. The Russians had an ugly trick of lying on the ground pretending to be wounded, and firing at us as soon as we passed, so our men massacred them right and left. The nights are bitterly cold at present, with heavy dews, while the sun during the day is very hot, and we have no shelter. How I enjoyed a drink of water and mind out of a hole made by a horse's hoof on the march the other day! Many of the Russian prisoners are splendid men, and kiss our hands when we give them water. They all seem to wear charms round their necks. I have preserved a number of relics, which I hope to take home. I send you a letter which fell from the pockets of a Russian, killed near me."

BOARDING THE KANGAROO.—"It is impossible to describe by letter the dreadful scene I witnessed on reaching her, and I trust I may never see the like again. As I and the chief officer of the Tynemouth pulled alongside in the dusk of the evening, a body which was being thrown over, was within an inch of striking him on the head. Had it done so it would undoubtedly have seriously injured him; but, as it happened, he only got a knocking. On board we found from 1,200 to 1,400 sick soldiers, and about 50 wounded. The sight was truly appalling. The decks were strewn with the dying and the dead."

RUSSIAN GENERALSHIP!—A great many rifles of superior workmanship were picked up. Their maker is Malherbes, of Liège. Many of the Russians shammed wounded. In one redoubt a general officer was captured. He was stretched on the ground beside his fallen horse, apparently dead. An artilleryman, who had taken a violent fancy to his coat, was about to divest the supposed corpse of it, when the body began to move, and nearly frightened the man off. It was soon discovered that no harm had come to the general, for on his coat being opened, two stars announced his rank. The general's object was evidently to lie quietly until night, and then make off. This ruse completely failed.

OUR FRENCH ALLIES.

DESPATCHES FROM MARSHAL DE ST. ARNAUD.

The lamented death of Marshal de St. Arnaud renders his last despatch, more touching than it would have proved under other circumstances. It does credit to his head and his heart; France has lost an able and a gallant chieftain, and England a valuable coadjutor in her campaign. No one can read the despatch without praising the manner in which the French commander speaks of the conduct of Lord Raglan and the English troops, nor could a greater compliment be paid our gallant countrymen than that contained in the short but emphatic order of the day, addressed by the French commander-in-chief to his troops, in which he tells them that they rivalled in courage their brave allies the English.

The Moniteur of Saturday last gives the despatch as follows:—

"The Emperor has received from Marshal St. Arnaud the following report of the battle of the Alma. No one can read without emotion this simple recital of a great victory, where the general-in-chief speaks of every one except himself. Nevertheless the Government appreciates, as it merits, the energy and ability displayed by the marshal under these circumstances. The Emperor has decided that a salute of twenty-one guns shall be fired to celebrate this victory:—

"Field of Battle, Alma, Sept. 21.

"SIRE,—The cannon of your Majesty has spoken—we have gained a complete victory. It is a fine day, Sire, to add to the military annals of France, and your Majesty will have one name more to add to the victories which adorn the flags of the French army.

"The Russians had yesterday assembled all their forces and all their means, in order to oppose the passage of the Alma. Prince Menschikoff commanded in person. All the heights were crowned with redoubts and formidable batteries. The Russian army reckoned 40,000 bayonets came from all the points of the Crimea. In the morning there arrived from Theodosia 6,000 cavalry, and 180 pieces of heavy and field artillery. From the heights which they occupied the Russians could count our men man by man, from the 19th to the moment when we arrived on the Babouch. On the 20th, from six o'clock in the morning, I carried into operation, with the division of General Bosquet, reinforced by eight Turkish battalions, a movement which turned the left of the Russians and some of their batteries. General Bosquet manoeuvred with as much intelligence as bravery. This movement decided the success of the day. I had arranged that the English should extend their left in order at the same time to threaten the right of the Russians, whilst I should occupy them in the centre, but their troops did not arrive in line until half-past ten. They bravely made up for this delay.

"At half-past twelve the line of the allied army occupied an extent of more than a league, arrived on the Alma, and were received by a terrible fire from the tirailleurs.

"In this movement the head of the column of General Bosquet appeared on the heights, and I gave the signal for a general attack. The Alma was crossed at double quick time. Prince Napoleon, at the head of his division, took possession of the large village of Alma, under the fire of the Russian batteries. The Prince showed himself worthy of the great name he bears. We then arrived at the foot of the heights, under the fire of the Russian batteries. There, Sire, commenced a real battle along all the line—a battle with its episodes of brilliant feats of valor. Your Majesty may be proud of your soldiers—they have not degenerated—they are the soldiers of Austerlitz and of Jena. At half-past four the French army was everywhere victorious. All the positions had been carried at the point of the bayonet, to the cry of 'Vive l'Empereur,' which resounded throughout the day. Never was such enthusiasm seen; even the wounded rose from the ground to join in it. On our left the English met with huge masses of the enemy, and met with great difficulties, but everything was surmounted. The English attacked the Russian positions in admirable order under the fire of their cannon, carried them, and drove off the Russians. The bravery of Lord Raglan rivals that of antiquity. In the midst of cannon and musket shot he displayed a calmness which never abandoned him. The French lines formed on the heights and the artillery opened its fire. Then it was no longer a retreat, but a rout; the Russians threw away their muskets and knapsacks, in order to run the faster. If Sire, I had had cavalry I should have obtained immense results, and Menschikoff would no longer have had an army; but it was late, our troops were harassed, and the ammunition of the artillery was exhausted. At six o'clock in the evening we encamped on the very bivouac of the Russians. My tent is on the very spot where that of Prince Menschikoff stood in the morning, and who thought himself so sure of beating us that he left his carriage there. I have taken possession of it, with his pocket-book and correspondence, and shall take advantage of the valuable information it contained. The Russian army will probably be able to rally two leagues from this, and I shall find it to-morrow on the Katscha, but beaten and demoralised, while the allied army is full of ardour and enthusiasm. I have been compelled to remain here in order to send our wounded, and those of the Russians, to Constantinople, and to procure ammunition and provisions from the fleet. The English have had 1,500 men put hors de combat. The Duke of Cambridge is well; his division, and that of Sir G. Brown, were superb. I have to regret about 1,200 men hors de combat, 3 officers killed, 51 wounded, 253 sub-officers and soldiers killed, and 1,033 wounded. General Canrobert, to whom is due, in part, the honours of the day, was slightly wounded by the splinter of a shell, which struck him in the breast and hand, but he is doing well. General Thomas, of the division of the Prince, is seriously wounded by a ball in the abdomen. The Russians have lost about 5,000 men. The field of battle is covered with their dead, and our field hospitals are full of their wounded. We have counted a proportion of seven Russian dead bodies for one French. The Russian artillery caused us loss; but ours is very superior to theirs. I shall all my life regret not having had with me my two regiments of African Chasseurs. The Zouaves were the admiration of both armies; they are the first soldiers in the world.

"Accept, Sire, the homage of my profound respect, and of my entire devotedness.

"Marshal A. DE SAINT ARNAUD."

After the battle, the following order of the day was published:—

"ORDER OF THE DAY OF MARSHAL DE SAINT ARNAUD."

"SOLDIERS,—France and the Emperor will be satisfied with you. At Alma you have proved to the Russians that you are the worthy descendants of the conquerors of Eylan and of the Moskova. You have rivalled in courage your allies the English, and your bayonets have carried formidable and well-defended positions. Soldiers, you will again meet the Russians on your road, and you will conquer them, as you have done to-day, to the cry of 'Vive l'Empereur,' and you will only stop at Sebastopol. It is there you will enjoy the repose which you will have well deserved.

"Field of battle of Alma, Sept. 20."

THE LATE MARSHAL DE ST. ARNAUD.

M. de Saint Arnaud was born at Paris, in 1801, of a family not distinguished by fortune. He was young when he entered the army, and, like most of those youths who embraced the military profession during the tranquil reign of Louis XVIII., he gave full play to the love of pleasure and dissipation. During the reign of Charles X. he was for a short time in the body-guard of that monarch; but he shortly after resigned his situation, and came to England, where he resided some time. Soon after the Revolution of 1830 he returned to France, and once more entered the army. It was at this time, while the regiment to which he belonged was on duty at Fort de Blauze, where the Duchesse de Berri was imprisoned, that he obtained the favourable notice of Marshal Bugeaud, commandant of the citadel, by his intelligence and activity.

In 1837, as captain, he went to Algiers in the Foreign Legion, which was chiefly composed of political refugees who had sought employment in the armies of France. In that corps M. de Saint Arnaud, distinguished alike by his intrepidity and his military skill, contributed powerfully to the success of many important enterprises. In less than ten years he rose through the various grades, from that of chief of the battalion to the dignity of Marshal of France. Among the exploits in which he distinguished himself, the most important were the expedition he directed, in 1842, against the unsubdued tribe of Beni-Boudoun, in the west of Miliamah; the attack of the Beni-Ferrah tribe in the following year; the defeat of the Flienza-el-Bahr; and the submission of the Cherif Bon Maza, who had provoked an insurrection in the Dahra.

Having been appointed to the command of the province of Constantine in 1849, he rapidly overran that immense territory, which had been disorganised by the revolt of the numerous tribes inhabiting it, re-established peace, and gained the good-will and attachment of many chiefs whom no one had previously been able to subdue. The expedition which M. de Saint Arnaud undertook in 1851 against the Kabyles was one of the most glorious campaigns ever gained by the French army in Algeria. At the head of an army of little more than 9,000 men he overran the whole of that savage mountainous region, in spite of the resistance made by its warlike tribes.

In 1851 M. de Saint Arnaud returned to France, with the rank of lieutenant-general. His energetic and determined character recommended him to the notice of Louis Napoleon, then President of the Republic, as one of the firmest supporters of his views; and in the month of October, 1851, the future Emperor confided to him the confidential post of Minister of War. In 1852 he was raised to the dignity of Marshal of France, and soon after to that of Senator, which was followed by his appointment to the post of Grand Ecuyer to the Emperor.

M. de St. Arnaud has been twice married. By his first marriage he had one daughter (married to M. de Freysburg) and a son, who became a soldier, and was killed in one of those campaigns in Algeria where his father won so much renown.

ARRIVAL OF THE REMAINS OF MARSHAL ST. ARNAUD AT MARSEILLES.

The Moniteur of Wednesday states that the Government of her Britannic Majesty has charged his Excellency Lord Cowley to transmit to the Government of the Emperor its condolences on the occasion of the death of Marshal de St. Arnaud. The following is the translation of the letter addressed by Lord Cowley to the Minister of Foreign Affairs:—

"Paris, Oct. 10.

"M. LE MINISTRE,—The Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of her Majesty has requested me to convey to the Emperor as promptly as possible the expression of the deep regret with which the Queen's Government received the news of the death of Marshal de St. Arnaud. The Government of her Majesty is desirous to offer to his Imperial Majesty and the French nation its condolences upon the lamentable event which has deprived the Emperor and France of the services of so brave and so eminent a general. If anything can soften the bitterness of the regret which the Government and the people of France must feel for such a loss, and which England shares, it is the reflection, although painful in itself, that a hero was shed upon the last moments of the Marshal by the clat of a victory which will be for ever glorious in the military annals of the two countries.

"In expressing your Excellency to make yourself the interpreter of these sentiments to the Emperor, I am confident that you will allow me to add the expression of my personal regret. To know Marshal de St. Arnaud was to love him, for the courteous affability of his private life was not less remarkable than his intrepid firmness upon the field of battle.—I profit by this occasion, &c., "COWLEY."

The Moniteur contains also the following article:—

"Marshal de St. Arnaud, before he succumbed to the malady the mortal germ of which he had borne so long, was desirous to fulfil most devotedly the mission which he had accepted from the Emperor and from France, by claiming the glorious privilege of commanding in chief the army of the East. The close witnesses of his long sufferings can only estimate the moral force which he required to combat and subdue them, without ceasing for an instant to maintain his difficult command, for he never concealed from himself the gravity of the disorder. He was more aware of it than anybody else, and when his strength failed him, and the fatal moment had arrived, he encountered, with serenity of mind strongly endued with religious sentiments, the termination of a struggle which was almost superhuman. The concluding sentences of his report of the 22nd of September have sufficiently proved this, and the letters and order of the day which we now publish afford a still more complete testimony:—

"On board the ship Ville de Paris, Sept. 12.

"M. LE MARÉCHAL.—My situation in regard to my health has become grave. Up to this time I have combated the malady with which I am affected with all the energy of which I was capable, and for a long time I had hoped that I was sufficiently habituated to suffering to be able to exercise the command without making known to all the violence of the attacks which I am condemned to suffer.

"But this struggle has exhausted my strength. I have had the pain of discovering lately, and particularly during the passage, during which I was upon the point of succumbing, that the moment was approaching when my courage would not suffice to enable me to support the heavy burden of a command which requires a vigour that I have lost, and which I hardly hope to recover.

"My conscience makes me consider it a duty to explain to you this position. I should hope that providence will permit me to complete the task which I have undertaken, and that I may be able to lead as far as Sebastopol the army with which I shall land to-morrow on the coast of the Crimea; but that will be, I feel, a last effort, and I beg you to ask the Emperor to allow me to appoint a successor.

"Accept, M. le Maréchal, the expression of my very respectful sentiments." A. DE SAINT ARNAUD.

"The Marshal Commanding-in-Chief."

"Head-quarters, Bivouac on the Tchernaya, Sept. 26.

"M. LE MARÉCHAL.—My health is deplorable. An attack of cholera has just been added to the evils from which I have suffered so long, and I am become so weak that to continue the command is I feel impossible. In this position, and however painful it may be to me, I feel it a duty of honour and conscience to place it in the hands of General Canrobert, whom the special orders of his Majesty indicate as my successor.

"The order of the day will explain the sentiments with which I separate myself from my soldiers, and renounce the pursuit of the great enterprise the happy commencement of which seemed to presage a glorious result for our arms."

"Please to accept, M. le Maréchal, the expression of my very respectful sentiments." A. DE SAINT ARNAUD.

"The Marshal Commanding-in-Chief."

The Berthollet arrived at Marseilles on the 10th with the remains of Marshal St. Arnaud, which were received with all possible honour. All the ships in the harbour hoisted their flags half-mast high. Madame de St. Arnaud, who accompanied the body of her husband, alighted at the Hôtel Beauveau. The body of the marshal being on the deck, a first salute of artillery was fired; a second salute was fired when it was lowered into the boat, and a third on its arrival on the quay. A gun continues to be fired every hour. The body has been deposited in the Cathedral with great ceremony. It will be removed to Paris. The Moniteur states that the expense of the funeral of the Maréchal will be defrayed by the public treasury. He is to be buried in the Hôtel des Invalides.

The Emperor and Empress have left Paris for Amiens, to be present at the consecration of a chapel dedicated to St. Eugénie in the cathedral of that town. The visit is in pursuance of a promise given to the clergy last year by the Emperor. A Te Deum will also be performed in thanksgiving for the victory of the Alma. The Emperor intends to confer upon Marshal St. Arnaud's widow the title of Duchess of Alma.

LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

RACING.

"On the green, green turf"

MR. EDITOR.—Since my last, Chantilly has had its two days' racing. Baron Rothschild's Orestes has beaten easily by the French mare Hervine in the struggle for the chief prize—The Emperor's Stakes. Hervine has twice run for the Goodwood Cup, and was one of the competitors for last year's Cambridgeshire. She is again engaged in the important race of the 24th, and will most likely receive some considerable support.

Newmarket has had a busy week. The Cesarewitch is over, and Muscovite the winner. He was "hotted up" for some purpose, and has achieved a good thing at last. My selection for the event was Muscovite and Calamus; the latter I was not surprised to find absent at the time for sailing. The cause of his retrogression in the betting was alluded to in my letter of last week. In short, Muscovite had the race to himself. Barring Rataplan and Rattle, a more moderate lot have seldom contested so great a stake. Rataplan at a stone less might have made a fight of it; but with 9st 7lb on his back, the weight was too crushing to afford him a chance. Some of the favourites are stated to have got off badly. Complaints of a bad start seem to be of rather too frequent recurrence. This should be looked to, and, if possible, remedied by those in authority. The decision of the starter ought to command equal respect with that of the judge. Well, there was no doubt as to the result, for Muscovite, with the greatest ease, made the Cesarewitch his own. On the previous day Lord Wm. Powlett's Nicholas, by the Emperor, won a handicap over the two-yr-old course. It must at once be admitted that these names were bestowed some time back; but, in the present state of public feeling, the taste could not be impugned that would induce owners of race-horses to change at once the Russian appellations given to some of the best of their cattle. The public were not gratified by a sight of the long-looked-for Greencus Esuriens. Like a carpet-knight, he still avoids the field of battle. The Glasgow Stakes at the Houghton Meeting may possibly afford him the opportunity of an easy conquest; but this constant shirking of the fray has had its effect, and the little Greek has receded several points in the Derby betting. The Clearwell fell to the lot of outsiders, in the shape of Mr. Payne's Polydoracott, by Cotherstone. I fully expected to see Oulston and William the Third win their engagements, but Mr. Payne and the Duke of Bedford were in great force throughout the meeting. In the numerous matches I believe I missed but one winner.

THE WARWICK AND LEAMINGTON OCTOBER MEETING is the first for decision in the forthcoming week.

THE GREAT WARWICK HANDICAP has an entry of forty horses, the weights ranging from 8st 9lb to 4st 6lb. A good field may, therefore, be expected, and speculation ought to be brisk. The animals that attract my fancy are Lady Vernon, Diomedes, St. Clare, Mislapp and The Spinner.

LEAMINGTON WELTER CUP.—This event may be governed as much by the riding as the running. I must choose Veteran and The Milkboop.

TWO-YEAR-OLD HANDICAP.—The Maid of Cadiz or Priestcraft may be there or thereabout at the finish.

The second day is almost devoted to the jumpers. Steeplechasing was not in the best of odour last season, and the opening of this will be watched with no little scrutiny. Straightforward conduct will soon restore it to its former popularity.

GRAND OPEN STEEPLECHASE.—There are seventeen nominations for this four-mile chase. Miss Mowbray is well in at 11st 3lb. Should she start she ought to be near winning. In her default I must select Needwood and Crabbs.

THE HANDICAP PLATE of £50 T.Y.C.—For this spin I should take the heat of the two-yr-olds, probably Westminster ster or Plausible, with the more mature Butterfly, to furnish the winner.

FREE HANDICAP HURDLE RACE.—Tipperary Boy or Columbine.

HUNT CUP STEEPLECHASE.—There are more conditions than horses for this race. Frank may prove the best or worst of the little lot.

Richmond holds out the prospect of a couple of pleasant days on Wednesday and Thursday next. But, as most of the stakes have yet to be entered for, and many of the horses engaged represent the same interest, I must confine myself to a brief notice of the Richmond Handicap. The Vet ought to be very near the winner.—Yours, TOBY PEERS.

MONEY MARKET, FRIDAY.

THREE O'CLOCK.—Consols, 95½; Ditto October Account, 95½.

COUNTRY CATTLE.

WAYNELL FAIR, October 10.—The number of sheep penned was, contrary to expectation, much less than last year, and prices were consequently in advance of the fairs that have been lately held by 2s. or 3s. a head. The sale was brisk, and it is estimated that at least 100,000 changed owners.

COUNTRY GRAIN.

ISPSWICH, October 10.—We have only a very small supply of wheat. A brisk sale resulted, therefore, and an advance upon last week's prices of 2s. to 3s. per quarter was established. We had a fair quantity of barley; there was considerable activity in this trade, and a further advance of 2s. and even 3s. per quarter was realised by the growers. Beans and peas dearer. We quote prices to the growers: Wheat, red, 56s. to 60s.; ditto, white, 60s. to 65s.; barley, malting, 31s. to 34s.; ditto, grinding, 28s. to 30s.; beans, 42s. to 48s.; peas, 40s. to 43s. per quarter. Averages for the week ending Oct. 7: Wheat, 96s. quarters, at 56s. 5d.; barley, 98l quarters, at 28s. 1d.; oats, 75 quarters, at 25s. 2d.; beans, 6 quarters, at 42s. 1d.; peas, 13 quarters, at 36s.

TURF TALK.

"The chosen sport of a great and a free people."
OUR SAILOR KING.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

THE series of Queen's Plates for the present year were finished at Stirling last week. Of the thirty-five that were contested in England and Scotland, Rataplan has won nine; Sharavogue, five; Kingston, four; Domino, three; Epaminondas, two; and The Hermit, Wild Huntsman, Aribba, Black Swan, Adine, Exact, Hungerford, Kbadidjab, The Skinner, St. Spiro, Defiance, and Hunca Munca, one each. Eighty-three years back there were only nineteen of these Royal Plates run for in England and Scotland, thirteen of which were contested in heats at four miles each, a trio at three-mile-heats, a couple at two-mile-heats, and one at four miles only.

The Marquis of Exeter, if we are to judge from the heavy reserved prices set upon the different animals comprising his lordship's stud, and the several ineffectual auction sales he has had, is very loath to secede from the turf. Only two of the noble marquis's stock, Margarette and Stockdove, were disposed of last week by the Messrs. Tattersall. No advance was made upon £3,500 for Stockwell; but Strood was sold privately to Mr. Howard, who afterwards disposed of him to Lord Maidstone. The exact price did not transpire, but the figure was certainly a very high one. Pocahontas, who also belongs to Lord Exeter, has proved herself quite equal to Phryne as a blood mare, having thrown Stockwell, Rataplan, King Tom, and Strood, in succession. The first-mentioned of this quartette was purchased by the marquis for 300 gs. when a yearling; Rataplan was bought last year for 650 gs., and £3,000 were refused for him last week; and Baron Rothschilds gave £2,000 for King Tom when two years old. Of these three one has enrolled himself among the St. Leger conquerors; the second was fourth for the Derby and third in the St. Leger; and the other, after running second for the recent Derby, was made first favourite for the great event at Doncaster, but unfortunately broke down. Stockwell's fever, caused by close feet-paring, has deprived us of a sight of him for eighteen months, till he floored the odds on the unlucky Kingston last week. We presume a harem is shortly to be formed for him, also. Rataplan, undoubtedly, has turned out the most sound and useful member of the family after all, although Stockwell won his owner twelve races out of nineteen, and £10,198, of which £9,998 was netted in 1852, for he never won other in his second or fourth year. His younger brother, Rataplan, though he has only amassed £4,848, has already won twenty-two races out of thirty-seven. Mr. T. Parr hired him this season for, it is said, £1,200; and has started twenty-eight times, winning £3,748 with him, and suffering defeat in ten instances. King Tom, the half-brother (being by Harkaway, instead of by the Barou), has shown in four races only, winning twice, and realising £1,170. Strood, who is by Chatham (the sire of Woolwich), has not yet given us an insight into his capabilities; but report speaks highly of his Derby chance; and, judging from his build and affinity, he is not unlikely to add another laurel to the wreath of the valuable dam, who herself claims descent from Glencoe, the Two Thousand Guinea and Ascot Gold Cup champion of 1834-35.

The vacancy about to be created by the secession of Lord Exeter, Mr. Greville, and others, will not be so strongly felt as was at first feared; for, independent of the strong support to be given by Lord Londesborough and Sir J. Boswell, it is whispered that the Emperor Napoleon is likely to patronise us, and that Lord Henry Seymour is about forming an extensive stud at Newmarket. It is hinted, too, that Mr. Jaques will probably join Mr. G. Payne after the break-up of the present confederacy. Lord William Ponlett is also expected to materially augment his stud for next season; and his Lordship's £1,200 bargain for 'The Hermit' would appear to strengthen the rumour. Now that the Earl of Chesterfield's luck seems to have taken a turn, it is to be hoped that renewed patronage will be extended to the Brethby establishment.

A draft from Mr. Knowles's team of racing stock was brought to the hammer on Monday last; and nine animals, including seven brood mares, fetched £2,360. Palmyra (the dam of Calonor), Talfourd, Baalbee, Marble Hill, &c., realised 600 gs.; and her dam (Hester) but sixty guineas. Her half-sister, Lola Montes, however, realised 350 gs.; Lolina, 300 gs.; and Queen Anne (the dam of Kingston), 300 gs. Talfourd and the maiden Marble Hill, half-brothers, were also sold; the former for 400 gs., and the latter for forty-five.

The "Houghton" week at Newmarket, though it is accompanied by the lurge of the flat-race season, is looked forward to with anxiety. The Criterion and Glasgow issues are fought with interest, as a meeting between the Bonnie Mori, Crinier, Westminster, and Rifleman in the one, and the debit of Graculus Esuriens in the other, is fully expected. It is whispered, also, that Strood is to shiver a lance for one or both of his engagements; if so, there will be a change come over the Derby investments very shortly. The penalties incurred among the Criterion candidates are Bonnie Mori and the Polyphra colt 6lbs each; Rifleman, Fayeaway, Saraband, and Antoinette, 6lbs each; and Para, Besika, Almond, and the Refraction colt, 3lbs each. We fully anticipate seeing Bonnie Mori turn the tables on the 'Squire's colt, and to fare better in his position at the finish than did his stable-companions, Daniel O'Rourke and West Australian, in 1851-2. Oulton will surely redeem his character in the 50 sovs Sweepstake, Ab.M.; Gretna win the 200 sovs Sweepstake, T.Y.C.; and the Trapper triumph in the 100 sovs Handicap essay, A.F. Unless Mr. Bowes's Derby crack, the "Hungry Greek," achieve a very easy victory in the Glasgow Stakes tourney, his chance for the Surrey encounter in May next will be but a sorry one, and the "knowing ones" completely taken in. His appearance can scarcely be questioned; but should he be an absentee, the Lincoln green may be successfully hoisted, and the 'Squire's health drunk in Claret! Should there be any mistake with the Malton couplet, the veteran turf patron may sweep away the brace of prizes. Speculation has not been particularly brisk about the Cambridgeshire Stakes. From his excellent running, both in this year and last, Rattle has become a "rattling" favourite. We augur a clever victory for him, and expect to see the French mare, Hervine, get a place. The Early Bird is certainly the best "lu" of the whole bevy of acceptors; but, from his receding, there appears to be something up with the animal. When will the Tupill cloud of misfortune be dispelled? The length will just suit Orinoco, and he has received strong support. Helena, too, is in force; but John Osborne himself must have considered her chance a very indifferent one when he submitted her to auction a few days back, or a race was practised to enable the stable to get on at a long shot. PYTHOS.

October 18, 1854.

[It is but just to our correspondent to state that Early Bird was scratched for this race subsequent to the above being written.]

STABLE-MANAGEMENT.—THE HACK.

(From the Oxford Journal.)

First, for the hack; let us look at him in his stall. There he stands, tied up by his head to the manger-rings, his body well clothed, and his legs half-buried in litter, clean and neatly-arranged at the edges; the stable is rather warm, but the groom knows the animal's skin will look all the better for that; he fondly imagines that the horse is very comfortable, very carefully tended; and so he is, indeed nearly killed with kindness. But there is something about him not quite contented; he is shifting one leg and then another, now looking round, now having a nibble at his manger, and looking altogether as if he would uncommonly like something to do. We should wish to take that careful groom, hold him by the halter, and, having bribed him to listen to us without interruption for ten minutes, go on in this wise:—"Now, my good fellow, first untie that horse's head, in fact, let him loose, make his stall into a box; take off those cloths; open those ventilators that you have so considerably plugged up; throw all that litter under his manger, and let him stand on the cool floor till the time comes for him to rest; straw is meant to be lain upon, not to keep the legs and feet in a perpetual stew!" Conceive the state of mind of the man who prides himself on the appearance of his horses and his stalls when spoken to in this strain; the idea of his stables being so maltreated, his horses standing on bare bricks. What would any gentleman think who came to see the stud? Ah, we forgot that! In our innocence, we were thinking only of the horse's comfort; we were for insuring cool stables, freedom of movement, limbs emancipated from the binding litter, with a cool surface for his feet.

We will now have the same animal outside the stable-door; he is about to undertake a journey, ridden or driven as may be; we need not follow him, but wait patiently until his return home, warm and somewhat tired. He is taken into his box, his saddle or harness removed; again he is brought outside, fastened to a ring near the stable-door, his feet and legs washed, again returned to the stable, dressed over, clothed, and littered down for the night. Now, this standing outside in the cool air after exertion cannot but be provocative of cold, and sometimes of serious internal inflammation; indeed, the very intention of it, to prevent the animal's perspiring in the stable after being clothed, is in itself a sufficient condemnation of the process, the melancholy effects of suppressed perspiration being familiar to all who think on the matter. The difficulty is easily removed by walking the horse gently for five or ten minutes before taking him into the stable, for, when once there, he is certainly the better for not being disturbed. On the treatment of the animal before we leave him for the night, we may be allowed to suggest the propriety of washing and well drying the feet and legs, clothing the latter with flannel bandages, and well rubbing the body with a wisp of hay. And here, in passing, permit us to remark, for the especial benefit of the dresser, that there is no version to use the said wisp after the manner of a mallet, the prevailing notion in the minds of those men being, that dressing a horse's skin, and beating his ribs in, are in some mysterious manner intimately connected.

Of course, we have been speaking of the treatment necessary for a journey of some length, that has produced a certain amount of exhaustion; the mere pleasure-ride or drive of an hour, or two calls for no more after-care than the ordinary morning exercise.

TATTERSALL'S. MONDAY.

THE SETTLING.

In two or three instances the doubts which had been raised at Newmarket were satisfactorily dispelled, and the settling proceeded with a degree of smoothness which was quite unexpected. A few of the members had even the good fortune to get in some old debts. It must, nevertheless, be confessed there still remained strong ground for complaint respecting the tightness of money and the difficulties occasioned by persons in default.

The conduct of some provincial speculators, who neither appeared in person nor by deputy, although they have abundant means of payment at command, gave rise to many severe comments. Procrastination is frequently the thief of credit, as well as of time.

COMING EVENTS.

The business that was transacted on coming events was tolerably active, all things considered.

The Kaffir was in strong demand for The Warwick Handicap, and Rattle advanced in favour for The Cambridgeshire Stakes. 10 to 1 was taken to £150 about Orinoco, and 20 to 1, to a like sum, about Little David. Scherz and Hervine were backed separately and together for some small sums at the prices quoted. 500 to 20 taken about Helena, and 20 to 1, to a little money, about Stonehenge. 25 to 1 was laid to £10, agst The Early Bird, and 1,000 to 20 agst Bonnie Moses. The movements respecting the last two place them "under suspicion."

The Derby, 3,000 to 300, 2,000 to 200, and 1,000 to 100 were taken about Graculus Esuriens; 12 and 11 to 1, in ponies, about Rifleman; 500 to 25 about Cruiser; 1,000 to 30 Saraband; and 1,500 to 50 Oulton.

IMPORTANT SALE OF BLOOD STOCK.

The following well-known brood mares, &c., the property of Mr. Knowles, were sold, on Monday, at Tattersall's:—
Hester, by Camel, out of Monimia, by Muley, &c. (the dam of Palmyra, Chatham, Murat, Zenobia, Hersey, Nubia, &c.) 60
Verminth, by Colchester, out of Yat, by Langar, her dam Wire (Sister to Whalbone), &c. 50

Talfourd (foaled in 1850), by Ion, out of Palmyra 400
Marble Hill (foaled in 1851), by Robert de Guiscard, out of Palmyra 45

It was expected that two or three of these celebrated mares would join the Royal stud, but, to the surprise of many persons, not one was purchased for it.

THURSDAY.

Cambridgeshire Stakes.—The Early Bird's downward tendency had for the last two or three weeks been so palpable, that his entire disappearance occasioned no surprise. The declaration that he would not run was received in London at 3.45 p.m. on Wednesday, the 18th inst.; all bets about him after that are consequently void. It is suggested by many of his backers, who thought to "pick up the worm with him," that in future he be called the Decoy Bird.

At the commencement 5 to 1 was taken about Rattle, and 6 to 1 betted agst Helino; but after the latter had been backed for £75, he advanced to 5 to 1, taken to upwards of £150, and was then backed against Rattle for 500 even; and so strong was the subsequent demonstration in his favour, that at the close he took up his position at 9 to 2, whilst Rattle receded to 7 to 1 taken and offered.

Scherz was in considerable force, and was backed for some money at 100 to 5, and 12 to 1. Hervine was also well supported; at first 20 to 1 was taken to £100, 500 to 20 was afterwards hooked two or three times, and the last investment was a pony at 15 to 1.

The odds quoted against Helena, Stonehenge, Barrel, Prime Minister, and The Assayer, were taken only to small sums. Offers to 1,000 to 5 agst Bonnie Moses!

The Derby, 3,000 to 100 was taken about Oulton, and 1,000 to 30 twice about Wild Dayrell.

The room was very thinly attended. The prices at the close of business were as follows:—

Cambridgeshire Stakes.

MANCHESTER.—THURSDAY.

On Saturday the principal book-makers were early in attendance, and at once commenced paying; and, considering that the settling days at Manchester are Monday and Tuesday, a good deal of money changed hands. On Monday the rooms were thickly attended, the backers of horses mustering in strong force, which afforded proof positive that they were on the right side. To-day the rooms were again well attended, and the settling has gone off tolerably well. One or two, whose names we shall withhold at present, have not yet put in an appearance, and whose creditors begin to fear that their absence is too significant; however, all hopes are not yet lost, but should they fail to come to a settlement, it will serve as a lesson to backers, and perhaps cause them, in future, to invest with men whose long standing insures stability, in preference to seeking for those who lay the longest odds. We may here remark that great credit is due to the Manchester book-makers for displaying their usual promptitude in discharging their liabilities upon this occasion, notwithstanding their heavy losses. The ring is supposed to have lost upwards of £100,000, and it is said that Messrs. Payne and Greville, and friends, have won upwards of £60,000.

Of course, there has been very little time to speculate upon the Cambridgehire Stakes; however, from what little was done, we are enabled to give the following list of quotations:—

Cambridgeshire Stakes.
5 to 1 agst Rattle (t & off)	20 to 1 agst Stonehenge (5 to 1 t)
8 to 1 — Orinoco (t)	25 to 1 — Little David (t & off)
15 to 1 — Helena (t)	50 to 1 — Hervine (t)
20 to 1 — Scherz (off)	100 to 3 — Khaddijah (off)
20 to 1 — Early Bird (off)

TURFIANA.

SELLING RACES.—At a meeting of the Jockey Club, held at Newmarket, on Wednesday, in the Second October Meeting, it was resolved "That the members of the Jockey Club having observed in the advertisements of some races in the country, which are stated to be generally under the same rules and regulations as Newmarket, that an exception is specially made of the rule under which beaten horses in a Selling Stake may be claimed for the price for which he is entered to be sold, with the amount of the stake, do recommend to the stewards of all races not to allow this exception in future."

THE CAMBRIDGESHIRE STAKES.—The Early Bird is declared not to run for the Cambridgeshire Stakes. The declaration was received in London on Wednesday at 2.45 p.m.

ARTILLERY.—Mr. Disney has disposed of his yearling colt, Artillery, to Mr. Morris, owner of Kingston, Indian Warrior, &c., for a specified period—we believe till after the St. Leger, 1856, is run for; in which race, as also the Derby, he is engaged. The terms are, of course, a secret. Artillery is got by Touchstone, dam by Irish Birdcatcher, and is as promising a colt in appearance as ever was foaled.

The following stakes closed this week at the Curragh:—2nd class of Madrids, Limerick Handicap Stakes, and National Steeplechase; the Heath, Bellewstown, and Carlow Two-Year-Old Stakes.

Macroom Races will take place early in November. There will be two days' running, and an attractive programme is, we understand, to be shortly published.

The following hunters, the property of Charles Roche, Esq., were sold in Dyer's on Saturday last, and realised the following prices:—The Dasher, ch g, aged, by Navarino, up to 15st, Captain Sheldon, £250; Gavazzi, br g, aged, by Cupbearer, up to 14st, H. M. Stapylton, Esq., Queen's Bays, £90; Charlie, br g, aged, up to 14st, Major Ennis, £175; Falcon, ch g, aged, by Birdcatcher, dam by Twilight, grand-dam by Old Swordsman, up to 14st, — M'Evoy, Esq., £74; Cavalier, ch g, aged, by Magic, up to 16st, W. Davis, Esq., £11; The Bedouin, ch g, aged, by Ishmael, winner of several steeplechases, and is now in training, Captain Dew, £24; Susan, br m, a capital roadstress and good harness mare, R. Woolsey, Esq., £21.

THE HON. CAPT. HUTCHINSON'S PICTURE, "The Corinthian Cup," 1854, painted by M. Angelo Hayes, Esq., is now on view at Cranfield's Gallery, Dublin, and has been inspected during the past week by a large number of distinguished personages.

THE LIMERICK, CARRICKMACROSS, and MAZE MEETINGS, take place next week in Ireland. Carrick is likely to suffer most by the clashing.

THE DROGHEDA TRADESMEN'S PLATE (run for at Bellewstown) for next year has 100 sows added to it. The meeting is fixed for the 4th and 5th of July.

THE STEWARDS of the Jockey Club, to whom the case was referred by the stewards of Plymouth races, have decided that Tower is entitled to receive the Saltram stakes. The objection was made by the owner of the second horse, on the ground that Tower had formerly run under a false description, being the same horse that won last year at Wye, and at Lenham, as Mr. G. Drewe's ch g Billy Boy, by Johnny Boy, 4 yrs old. This was admitted; but it was stated on the other side that it was done in error, that on the discovery of the mistake the amount of those races had been paid to the owner of the second horse, and that when Tower afterwards ran at Kelso as Mr. Robson's, all the circumstances were stated to the stewards of those races before he started. Upon the evidence adduced the stewards of the Jockey Club did not think there was sufficient ground for disqualifying the horse at Plymouth; but Mr. Drewe was informed that on the discovery of the mistake he ought not only to have refunded the stakes, but to have given notice of the fact, so that the report of the two races at Wye and Lenham might be officially corrected in the Racing Calendar.

THE DUKE OF ROTLAND's two-year-old c by John'o' Gaunt, out of Nina (winner of the Rutland stakes), is named Harry of Ilford.

AT A MEETING of the Jockey Club, held at Newmarket, on Wednesday, the Hon. G. W. Fitzwilliam was elected a member.

THE BERKSHIRE HOUNDS.—The opening day of this famed pack of fox-hounds is fixed for Wednesday, November 1st, at the kennel, Tubney, Berks. Foxes, we understand, are very numerous, horses and hounds in first-rate condition, and the worthy master, James Morrell, jun., Esq., with his staff of huntsmen and whips, will, it is well-known, do their best to sustain the reputation of this celebrated pack.

MR. COLYER'S WEST KENT FOX-HOUNDS.

The welcome intelligence of the noble sport of fox-hunting having commenced under most cheering prospects, will be highly gratifying to all sportsmen, those especially that hunt with the above crack hounds. Although the appointments have not yet been issued, and the covers only brushed, sufficient has been ascertained to prove that throughout the whole length and breadth of the hunt foxes are not rarities.

Much credit is due to the spirited and liberal proprietor, Thomas Colyer, Esq. Although no titled birth has he to boast, he keeps up his stud and hounds in a princely manner; the beauty and symmetry of the latter is perfection itself, their speed extraordinary, and well may the worthy 'Squire be justly esteemed one of the best breeders of fox-hounds in the south of England.

In olden times the painted Briton, the Roman, and the Saxon entered with fiery ardour into the chase, either in pursuit of the bear, the wolf, the wild boar, or bull, with which the forests and hills of "merrie England" abounded; but, owing to civilisation and the plough, a wonderful change has been effected. Little does the peasant dream, while whistling at the plough, that probably on the very ground he is so carefully tilling many a fierce combat may have taken place between the savage beasts of the forest and the mighty hunter of other days:—

"In ancient days, as story says,
The woods our fathers sought,
The rustic race adored the chase,
And hunted as they fought."

Again, relative to the capabilities of the master and his huntsman, they are so well known that eulogy is unnecessary, yet it is no more than just to mete praise where so much is due; and with such a one as the former, the words in the song of "Tom Moody," with a slight alteration, are very appropriate:—

"A more able sportsman ne'er follow'd a hound
Through a country well known to him fifty miles round,
No hound ever open'd with the 'Squire' near the wood,
But he'd challenge the tone and could tell if 'twere good."
A NIMROD.

SEAL, KENT.—FOX-HUNTING.—One of those social and merry meetings—which are of too rare occurrence—took place at the Kentish Yeoman Inn, on the evening of Friday last, when several Nimrods and their friends met, for the purpose of giving a welcome to Mr. Colyer's huntsmen, and spending an hour or two with the worthy host—a brother Nimrod—who had provided a night's lodging for the "squire's" hounds. Many a racy and sporting anecdote, together with some long and extraordinary runs, were broached and duly commented on during the evening, until a late hour, when all departed perfectly satisfied, and fully determined, let what would happen, a hunt they would have in the morning. Soon after peep o' dawn on the following morning, the blast of the hunter's horn was heard on the Chart, where it was evident the eager pack would soon prove there was "varmint" on the pad; in the distance was heard a rattling view-hallo, and, in the twinkling of a bedpost, the gallant hounds were at their work, their musical notes sounding through the groves "like bells upon the wind." Hark-away! Hark-forward!—the sportsman joyfully cry; but, unluckily, old reynard effected an entry "to earth" just in time to save his bacon and his brush. Another fox or two were found, at length, and away went a good one for the green-topped hills across the valley, with the hounds up to their work, and bent on killing.

The pack full opening various,
To lead the merry crew across the vale, having mounted the wood-crowned height, "old Charley" sailed gaily onward with his head in the direction for Mapscombe, but, ere he could reach the earths, the hounds run into and killed him in gallant style; thus ended a pleasant brush with the West Kent Fox-hounds. A NIMROD.

THE DUBLIN GARRISON STAG-HOUNDS have been parted with to G. Bryan, Esq., of Jenkinstown-park, co. Kilkenny, in consequence of the few military at present quartered in the Irish metropolis. The Ward Unions, which have been lately augmented by the addition of the Bellintra hounds, (purchased at a long figure from J. J. Preston, Esq.), will therefore have the entire of the county Dublin to themselves, and will hunt, during the coming season, three days in each week.

A MOOR ON FIRE.—During the last few days the extensive tract of moor land at Thorne, eight miles from Doncaster, has been on fire, the flames extending over several miles. The covers for hares and pheasants have been entirely destroyed, and considerable damage done to several plantations and turf-stacks. The fire is supposed to have originated in an act of mischief.

HER MAJESTY'S NEW YACHT.

The month of January next has now been fixed as the period when the splendid new steam-yacht, the Windsor Castle, now building at Pembroke for the Queen, is to be finished and launched. The greatest exertions are being made in order to hasten her progress. A large body of the best men are constantly at work upon her, and converted timber has regularly been brought round from the other yards in order to expedite her build. She is so far advanced that an excellent idea may be formed of her; and there is no doubt that she will prove a model of beauty both in finish and mould. Her lines have evidently been laid with care and judgment, and promise great speed; while her immense length, (more than 100 yards), and proportionate beam, will secure ample accommodation, not only to Royalty, but also to the officers and crew—a comfort in which the Victoria and Albert is sadly deficient. The Windsor Castle is built of mahogany chiefly, with sound British oak. The diagonal planking has been laid.

ROYAL LONDON YACHT CLUB.

The monthly meeting was held on Monday; Mr. Eagle filled the chair and Mr. Crookford the vice-chair. About a dozen members were present at the house dinner, and more than forty subsequently at the commencement of business. Towards the close of the evening the club-room was crowded. After the confirmation of minutes, and the elections, and the notification of many candidates for the ballot on the third Monday in November, Mr. Crookford withdrew, by leave, the motion of which he had given notice; it will, however, not be lost sight of by the Sailing Committee in their approaching revision of the rules. A discussion followed relative to the pilot dues exacted from yachts visiting the Scheldt, of which subject we shall not lose sight in THE FIELD. Yachts ought to be exempt from such extortions, simply because the "black mail" (a few francs excepted) goes to the Government and not to the poor pilots themselves. "Government dues" certainly should include pilotage. Wednesday was fixed for the Stewards' meeting relative to the annual dinner, at which the Commodore, now returned from the continent, will preside. The pecuniary deficiency as to the steamer engaged in the late match was on Monday voted out of the club funds, and the meeting adjourned.

LONDON MODEL YACHT CLUB.

By some unaccountable delay, the detailed account of the recent match between the 12-foot boats of this rising club has not reached THE FIELD. We find that at Erith the following time was taken as the yachts rounded; that at Greenwich we are yet unaware of. The Volante, belonging to Mr. West, is said to have carried off the prize.

Mary Ann kept the lead all the way down, but was then bothered too much by the ebb-tide to retain her advantage. The ebb enabled her opponents to close upon her.

ROYAL CORK YACHT CLUB.

A general meeting of the members of the Royal Cork Yacht Club was held on Thursday, the 5th instant. There was a large assemblage of members, as it was the last meeting of the season. Richard Frankland, Esq., vice-admiral, was in the chair. The following resolution was unanimously passed:—"That all owners of yachts who shall be members of other royal yacht clubs, not resident in the province of Munster, be admissible as members of the Royal Cork Yacht Club without payment of entrance, on an annual subscription of £2, to be allotted for in the ordinary way. Such members to be designated 'out-port members,' permitted to carry the colours and warrant of the club. Such persons to be eligible only while owners of yachts of at least 'ten tons,' or to the end of the season in which they shall have disposed of the same." The annual dinner at the close of the season took place on the same day; and, after an evening spent with the utmost enjoyment that good fare and pleasant company could compass, the members of the "Old Royal Cork" separated, longing for the commencement of the season of '55.

SAPPHIRE'S RETURN.—The Right Hon. Milner Gibson, M.P., has arrived in Wilton-crescent, from an extended cruise in the Mediterranean, in his yacht, the Sapphire.

YACHTING IN AUSTRALIA.

THE IVANHOE AND THE MIDGE.

A race between these two crack yachts was made for £25 a side, the Ivanhoe being backed by her owner, Mr. Hector Martin (who steered her in the struggle), and the Midge by Mr. George Wright. This little event caused no small anxiety and speculation amongst parties to whom each vessel was a favourite. The course was a start from the Market Wharf, rounding the Floating Light and Sow and Pigs, to the N. returning, and then round Pinchgut, on the north side, and again proceeding to the Floating Light and Sow and Pigs, same course, and finishing at the Asa Packer, barque, moored off the Market Wharf. The computed distance of the race was about thirty miles. Great anxiety was felt amongst the betting community as to the weather. Many thinking that in light weather, the little Midge would run away from her more sturdy antagonist. The day appointed for the race set in with a stiff breeze from the S.E. The Ivanhoes all in the ascendant. Betting, 6 to 4 in their favour. The Midges, nothing daunted, kept the steam up—knowing well that if anything was to be got out of the craft, "Davy Anderson" could and would do it. Mr. John Rayner, the wopire named in the articles of the race, was, we regret to say, so unwell that he could not be present; his place was, however, well filled by Mr. W. Stewart. At the start, both boats being head to wind, had to swing round, and in the performance of this manœuvre, the crew of the Midge showed bad judgment in swinging towards shore, where a schooner lay right in their way. The consequence was, that she ran into the vessel, and was nearly a minute in getting clear. Meantime, the Ivanhoe got well away, and gained considerably on her opponent. At Pinchgut, the Midge appeared to be dragging her sail. Not being able to take it in, she went out of her course, and got under the lee of Garden Island, where the crew were four minutes and a half taking in sail. The race was as follows—Start by the Unipire's watch, 16 m. to 12—Bradley's Head, Ivanhoe, 15 m. 30 sec. past 12; Midge, 21 m. 30 sec. past 12. Back round Pinchgut—Ivanhoe, 2 m. 30 sec. past 1; Midge, 11 m. past 1. After again going round the Floating Light and the Sow, and arriving at the starting place, the Ivanhoe made her time at 23 m. to 3, the Midge some 8 or 9 minutes behind. Little more need be said about the race. The Ivanhoe, owing to the day, was the favourite. She took a lead, shooting a hail of the little Midge, and thus she kept throughout the race. As to the steering of the two, we leave that to themselves—men do not like to be interfered with. We understand there is likely to be another match between them, and a different day might produce a different result. Our wish is, that the best may win. Time of the race, 2 hours 53 minutes.

YANKEE YACHTING.

REGATTA AT STONINGTON.

I send you in this the result of the regatta at Stonington. The day was pleasant, the weather fine, and the whole affair passed off very satisfactorily. Good time was made by the large number of boats which were entered. The distance was thirty miles out and back. There were entered five boats of the first class, of which the Washington, of New York, took the first prize of $100. The second prize (a valuable telescope) fell to the ownership of the America, a Philadelphia craft. The following boats of the second class were entered:—

	m.	s.		m.	s.
Nammeang	3	45	Arrow	4	20
R. F. Loper	3	17	Bald Aleck (did not go round the stake boat)	—	—
Fawn	4	1	North Star	—	—
Wave	4	2
Nellie Kenzie	4	2

The first prize of $50 was taken by the Nammeang; the second of $30 by the R. F. Loper.

Of the third class the following boats were entered:—

	m.	s.		m.	s.
Anicula	3	50	N. C. Breckenridge	4	15
Little Midge	4	0	Minnie	4	21
Cygnat	4	12	Wave	4	23
Little Viper	4	13	Shanghai	—	—
Racer	4	15	Nat Darfee	—	—
Wild Pigeon	4	15	Capt. Gardiner	—	—

The first prize of $30 was taken by the Cygnat; the second of $20 by the Little Midge. The Little Viper was ruled out. Bets ran rather high, and several pockets were considerably lightened in consequence. The occasion was one of much hilarity, and productive of many good results.

SCATHELOCK COCKLESCRAFT.

THE YACHT MISCHIEF.—In the Mobile Tribune we find the following list of this fine sailing craft's victories, which may not be uninteresting to some of our readers:—In 1849 the Mischief sailed with the New York squadron, among which was the famous Maria, and, although the smallest craft of all, she beat the whole fleet. During the same year she sailed a match-race with a north river sloop of sixty tons for $500, nine miles dead to windward, and notwithstanding no allowance was made for size, the Mischief won easily, the breeze being very stiff. In the Lake House Regatta on Lake Pontchartrain, April 11, 1850, she broke the lower pintle of her rudder before the race, and was beaten in consequence by the Roger Stewart and Kate. At the Point Clear Regatta, June 27, same year, the Mischief won, beating the Roger Stewart, Sea Serpent, Kate, &c. In the regatta from New Orleans to Pass Christian, July 4, same year, the Mischief was the first boat to the stake, but received only the second prize in consequence of having been by mistake taken several miles out of her course by the pilot towards the Bay of St. Louis. The Roger Stewart took the prize, the beaten boats being the Rhodes, Sea Serpent, Kate, and eight others. On Sept. 22, 1851—Point Clear Regatta—the Mischief was again winner, beating J. G. Robinson's Sylph, Roger Stewart, Vision, and Kate. On the 6th of October, in Howard's regatta, she was victorious, again beating the Sylph, Roger Stewart, and Vision. These successful feats certainly entitle the Mischief to be ranked as a Victor. She has recently been thoroughly overhauled and put in perfect trim, and is worthy the attention of clubs.

BOAT RACES.—Quite an exciting boat-race took place on Wednesday last at Hillgate, for a stake of $50. Some twenty sail boats were entered and the contest was quite spirited, the Challenge reaching her goal ahead of all others, but for some reason she was denied the stake. After the principal race, a match took place between two row boats, in which a Mr. Decker won the purse. A very interesting and exciting race came off the same afternoon, between the boats S. C. Foote, sailed by Walter Dixon, and the Ranchero, by J. M. Griffen. The former is eighteen feet long, and had twenty-two yards in her sail, the latter seventeen feet, and sported thirty-three yards. They went round Robbin's Reef light, and back to Whitehall slip, a distance of ten miles, the S. C. Foote coming in a long distance ahead.—New York Aug. 19.

CHALLENGE FROM THE BAY QUEEN.—Seeing in the account of the New Rochelle Regatta that it was regretted that Bay Queen, built by Fish and Morton, did not sail; and as Mr. Kirby seems so anxious to test the speed of his boats, we will sail the Bay Queen against the three winning boats, viz., the Wide Awake, Huguenot, and Flying Cloud (which we understand are the fastest boats Mr. Kirby has ever built), a race of twenty or thirty miles, starting from Hoboken, and sailing in any direction Mr. Kirby may propose, and back to Hoboken. Each boat to put in $100, making a purse of $400, which is to be given to the winning boat. The race to be sailed according to the rules of the New Rochelle Regatta. The Bay Queen is of less tonnage and carries smaller sails than any of the above boats; so if she should prove the fastest, the credit should be given to her superiority of model.—FISH AND MORTON, No. 404, Water-street, New-York.—Centreville, New Jersey, Sept. 1, 1854.

CRICKET.

UNFAIR BATS.

MR. EDITOR.—Allow me to correct a slight mistake made by your correspondent R. V. in your last week's paper. He states that the player (mentioned in "Nyxen's Guide to Cricketers" as bringing a bat which effectually covered the wickets) was allowed to use the same. This is false; as the bat was judged to be unfair; and, after that, an iron stand was made, through which if a bat could not pass it was judged unfair. Trusting you will give publication to this, for the sake of correcting the error, I remain, &c. T. C. F. L.

CRICKET AT WELLINGBOROUGH.—The Rev. A. Orlebar presided at the dinner, after the concluding game of the cricket season, of the Wellingborough club, and on its behalf presented Mr. A. Sharman with a silver cup, as an acknowledgment of the services rendered by him to the cricketing cause in that town.

MARRIED AND SINGLE OF DEDDINGTON.—A well-contested game came off recently in the Castle Ground, at that town. The single gentlemen won with 40 runs to spare, the score being: Single, 71 and 60—131; of which, G. Butler, made 8 and 1; W. T. Rose, 22 and 8; B. Field, 2 and 5; E. Turner, 1 and 7; W. C. Risley, 7 and not out 18; E. Margett, 17 and 7; H. Churchill, 1 and 0; Markbam, nil; H. Stone, 2 and 7; W. Moreton, not out 3 and 0; B. French, 0 and 2; Byes, 8 and 5. Married, 32 and 58—90; of which R. Field marked 5 and 15; W. Sturck, jun., nil; T. French, 0 and 13; W. Sturck, 1 and 12; T. Nobbs, 10 and 0; S. Sinson, 1 and 0; S. Field, 11 and not out 5; E. Bennett, 3 and 0; C. Churchill, 0 and 4; C. Stevens, 0 and 4; W. Gihbard, not out 0 and 0; Byes, 1 and 5.

SOULDERN v. CHESTERTON.—Lately, at Souldern, a game at cricket came off between the club of that place and of Chesterton. The latter won; the score being: Southern, 64 and 61—125; of which J. Hickman made 1 and 1; J. Stuckbury, 2 and not out 13; J. Short, 4 and 9; T. Tebbly, 20 and 3; N. Ramsay, Esq., 5 and 0; W. Hawkins, 5 and 0; H. Stuckbury, 5 and 7; T. Berridge, 0 and 4; H. Boddington, not out 10 and 2; A. Barton, 0 and 3; J. Harbridge, 3 and 18; Byes, &c., 9 and 1. Chesterton, 54 and 75—129; of which T. Liue marked 14 and 8; J. Reynolds, 3 and 4; J. Lamb, 6 and 4; E. Heritage, 2 and 2; R. Tanner, 11 and 12; J. Tanner, 12 and not out 14; J. Buckle, not out 3 and 6; H. Jakeman, 0 and 2; F. Tauner, nil; W. Badnight, 1 and 8; E. Jakeman, 1 and not out 3; Byes, &c., 1 and 12.

NEW CRICKET CLUB FOR EAST ESSEX.—An effort is being made by some of the leading cricket players in Colchester and the neighbourhood, to form a cricket club on a wide basis for this part of the county, to be named, we understand, "The Colchester and East Essex Cricket Club." It is intended to prepare a first-rate ground in some convenient locality, and to secure the aid of a professional bowler. Several gentlemen are canvassing for donations and subscriptions in furtherance of the object; and we are told they have met with much encouragement. It is a singular fact that at present there exists no cricket club in this town of 20,000 inhabitants.

A CHINAMAN'S NOTION ON QUEEN VICTORIA AND PETTICOAT GOVERNMENT.—Ki-Chan, the commissioner who concluded the peace with England in 1840, for which he was afterwards disgraced, thus spoke of her Majesty and Prince Albert to the French missionaries, MM. Huc and Gabet, on falling in with them in Tibet during his embassy there:—"It appears," said he, "that this woman has great abilities, but her husband, in my opinion, plays a very ridiculous part; she does not let him meddle with anything. She laid out for him a magnificent garden full of fruit trees and flowers of all sorts, and there he is always shut up passing his time walking about."

MEETINGS.

—The Earl of Zetland, Wm. Pitt, and The Deputy Grand Master, the Earl of Farnborough, &c., having been received with the usual devotion, the substance of the Initiates was proposed, for which Bro.
Ankley returned thanks, in which he said that, "having heard much of Masonry, he had long desired to become one amongst them; but his business avocations requiring his presence at various parts of the world, he thought that that might be a bar to his entering so excellent an order. He was, however, glad to find that such was not the case, for, as a bird of passage, he was now convinced that his association with Masonry would materially assist his progress through that portion of the globe where Freemasonry is known." Bro. Canstatt returned thanks for the prosperity of the Benevolent Fund, to which he called for the attention of brethren, exhorting them not to relax their efforts to make this fund worthy any institution in the world. It had been uniformly successful, and the efforts of the assistants of various charities had been as well positioned as any Brother present, and had largely received assistance from. They had upwards of £400 in hand, which had been raised by the spontaneous donations of brethren. It was intended

* We regret to say, this is an abuse that requires correction in many lodges. We have observed Brethren leave the table, doff their Masonic clothing, put on their hats and cloaks, and even hold a conversation, before the W.M. had closed the lodge. We presume it is a want of thought; nevertheless, it is a want of courtesy to the chairman of any meeting, much more a Masonic one.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

DETAILS of the advance of the Allies upon Sebastopol, and descriptions of the preparations for the storming, have occupied public attention during the week. The great Russian stronghold cannot be said to be "invested," but it is menaced at three points by the two armies and the fleet, and its fate is as certain as anything in war can be. The latest news would seem to imply that the Russians have determined not to leave Sebastopol to the chance of siege, but to take another course for its protection, and that they design to attack the Allies in flank. We have no doubt that the victors of Alma will be able to give a good account of the foe, and that those who were beaten from one of the strongest positions ever occupied by a military force will not be found more formidable when they become the assailants. Meantime the enormous guns have been landed, the exertions of our sailors being put forth in the heartiest manner in aid of the besiegers, and earth was to be broken within 800 yards of the Russian works. The ground is described as rocky and with little earth, and therefore unfavourable for the operations of our engineers. The marines have asked and obtained leave to assist, and the first breach was, it was stated, to be stormed by these gallant fellows. "The breach is practicable—tell that to the marines," will be a glorious modification of the old gibe.

Much controversy is being carried on upon the subject of the propriety of aid being asked from the nation towards promoting the comfort of the wounded soldiery. Voluminous official documents are published, to show that the army is amply supplied with every necessary; and scores of letters, in reply, come forth, to prove that our soldiers are languishing and dying for the want of the very necessities thus stated to be furnished. The natural impulse of all who hear that a soldier who has been wounded in his country's service is lying helpless and untended, is to exclaim that, no matter who has, or has not, neglected his duty, the poor fellow shall not suffer; and forthwith subscriptions, medicines, bandages, lint, and every surgical appliance, are almost forced on the Executive. It seems hard to say that this is an undesirable interference by the nation; and yet how cruel it may really be to permit governments to look to private and uncertain charity, to do what it is the duty of the country to do. This is a most popular war, and there is not a man in England who would not gladly make a sacrifice in aid of the expedition to the Crimea. But other wars, equally just, may, from their distance, or other causes, cause little public interest or excitement. How sad will be the condition of the soldiery engaged in such wars, when the Government has been taught that private benevolence will permit it to neglect the organization and provision, which it is bound to carry out to the utmost perfection, out of the enormous sums of money the people so cheerfully pay for the purpose. We hesitate, therefore, to give any countenance to the scheme for private assistance to the Government. The Executive itself declares that it is unnecessary, and that the complaints are exceptional and exaggerated, and we think that the country is bound to accept the statement. But there is no danger of the flow of national benevolence being impeded—let us only see that it gushes into the right channel. The noble Patriotic Fund offers to every man, woman, and child, in the Queen's dominions, a means of testifying, to the utmost of his, her, or its power, to the sincerity of the admiration and kindness with which our Crimean heroes are regarded. From the millionaire to the milliner's apprentice, all may contribute to this fund. The cheque for the thousand guineas is welcome—welcome, too, is the little bag of hoarded half-pence. The donors to this fund may be assured that their money will not be wasted, squandered, or jobbed away, but that it will be applied conscientiously in the best, and, indeed, in the only desirable way—to do good to those whom England is ardent to serve. We think the subject of so much importance, that, at more than our usual length, we have attempted to indicate how and why distinction should be made between a sham charity and a real one.

Sir Charles Napier is coming home very soon, and it is now finally understood that the glories of Bomarsund, and of a blockade which Prussia has rendered nugatory, are to be the only features of the Baltic expedition of 1854. We greatly dislike to join in attaching any stigma to a noble name; and although we fear that there can no longer be any doubt as to the real reason why there has been no attempt of importance made in the Baltic, the glorious services of Sir Charles Napier, before advancing years made such a burden as the responsibility of the expedition too heavy for him, cuttle him to be dismissed with the gentle observation of the French monarch, when a favourite general had failed to vindicate his reputation: "All we can say is, that he is not so brave to-day as he was yesterday." Should the war be protracted, a younger leader must do the work for which the country has been looking. We may remark, by the way, that the journal chiefly favoured with the confidence of Government has taken two opportunities of inserting the severest reproaches to Admiral Dundas, to whom want of courage is almost imputed in terms. It appears hard that because Sebastopol will be taken with little aid from the admiral, that such a moment should be selected for pointing out his alleged failings, which were unnoticed when a stimulus might have been applied with advantage.

The magnificent funeral of Marshal St. Armand, in the church of the Invalides, took place on Monday, and the details will be found elsewhere. All that military and ecclesiastical pomp could do towards rendering the ceremonial memorable was put forth. The united flags of France, England, and Turkey, waved over his remains. May be the only leader of note lost to the good cause! Upon his accomplished successor, General Canrobert, devolves the honour of planting the tricolor upon the citadel of Sebastopol.

The Queen has returned to Windsor, and has held a Council there. Fourteen of the Ministers attended a Cabinet Council, on Tuesday, at the Foreign Office. A correspondence has taken place between Major Beresford ("W. B.") and Sir James Graham, in reference to some very strong personal language used by the Major in speaking of Sir James to some Essex Protectionists. But "W. B." having retracted the hardest word of all, Sir James has no more to say. The losses of the Newcastle fire amount, in lives, to nearly fifty, in money to £600,000. Court-martials on the officers in the Arctic Expedition, for the loss of their ships, have ended in the return of their swords not with compliments to all. The catastrophe connected with the same name—the Arctic—wherein 350 lives were lost, is shown to have been a sacrifice to "the Moloch, speed;" the captain—eager, for mercantile reasons, to arrive at his destination—having kept up the same speed through a dense fog-bank as he would have done in clear weather. We are glad to record that there seems a probability that the scoundrels who plotted massacre and committed murder on the Enniskillen railway will be brought to the scaffold, from which we trust no weak sentimentality, and—which we fear still more—no priestly influence, will have strength to save them.

The obituary of the week contains the name of Mr. Samuel Phillips, the author of "Caleb Stukeley," and the reviewer of literature for the Times newspaper, a most able—and a most kind hearted man; one who made his way, by talent and energy, out of the most discouraging circumstances and who, despite health (so wretched for years that, he could never venture out after dusk), laboured in his duty to the last, and left behind him a fair inheritance as well as a good name. His last public appearance was at the inauguration of the Crystal Palace, when he presented to her Majesty a general handbook of which he was the author, and which is a model of industry, research, and criticism.

METROPOLIS.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday being the day to which Parliament stood prorogued, in pursuance of the Order in Council, and by virtue of her Majesty's commission, the House of Lords met for the purpose of the Lords Commissioners, in the name of the Queen, continuing the prorogation until Thursday, the 16th of November next.

The Lords Commissioners present were the Right Hon. the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Argyll, and Earl Granville. As usual on these occasions, a large number of ladies and their friends were present, being admitted as spectators behind the bar; but the ceremony being of so simple and formal a character, no interest whatever can be created.

The Lords Commissioners met at half-past three o'clock, and having taken their seats in front of the throne,

The LORD CHANCELLOR rose, and having stated that their lordships had met, by virtue of her Majesty's Commission, for the further prorogation of Parliament, commanded Mr. Pulman, the Yeoman Usher of the Black Rod, to summons the House of Commons to appear at the bar, to hear the commission read.

Mr. Pulmer having retired for that purpose, shortly afterwards returned, accompanied by Sir Denis Le Marchant, chief clerk, and other officers of the House, as the representatives of her Majesty's most faithful Commons.

Mr. Shaw Lefevre, deputy clerk of the House, then read the commission, proroguing Parliament until Thursday, the 16th of November next.

The LORD CHANCELLOR then, in the usual manner, in the name of her Majesty, declared Parliament prorogued to that day accordingly.

Their Lordships then rose and retired.

PILLAR LETTER-BOXES IN THE METROPOLIS.—Lord Canning and the authorities of the General Post-office have had a scheme for some time in contemplation to facilitate the posting of letters in London, by establishing "pillar letter-boxes" in the most populous districts of the metropolis, and reducing the number of receiving-houses, which are attended with great expense. The subjoined circular from the Secretary of the General Post-office has been transmitted to the several district boards of Commissioners of Pavements in which the experiment is about to be made:—"Sir, I am directed by the Postmaster-General to state, with a view of giving additional facilities to the public for posting their letters, his lordship has it in contemplation to place pillar letter-boxes along the leading thoroughfares of the metropolis at intervals of half a mile, or thereabouts; and that he has selected the important line of Ludgate-hill, Fleet-street, the Strand, and Piccadilly, as the first wherein to erect these letter-boxes. It is proposed to fix the boxes on the side of the footway, in such a position as not to obstruct traffic of any kind, and the whole cost of construction and erection will be borne by this department. I request that you will inform me whether your board will give their permission for the erection of such letter-boxes in the district under their authority. Lord Canning will be happy to direct an officer of this department to meet any person your board may appoint, to consult respecting the precise points of construction.—I am, &c., R. HILL."

THE PUBLIC HEALTH (From the Registrar-General's Report).—The returns for the last week from the metropolitan districts furnish evidence of a steady, if not a rapid improvement in the public health. The deaths, which numbered 1,532 in the previous week, declined to 1,394 in that which ended last Saturday; but the mortality still exceeds the average of former years by more than 300 deaths, and it is also greater than the mortality of the same week in 1849, when the number had fallen to 1,075. Last week cholera was fatal in 249 cases, diarrhoea in 102. The deaths from the former disease were registered in the last two weeks in the five divisions of London in the following proportions:—in the western districts, 59 and 46; in the northern, 26 and 14; in the central, 31 and 24; in the eastern, 95 and 50; and on the south side of the river, 200 and 115. In the second week of October, 1849, the deaths reported as caused by cholera were 110. Scavlatina prevails to some extent in London, and the mortality from it exhibits a weekly increase. In the last three returns this disease numbered 88, 105, and 112. This is considerably more than the average.

RACKETS.—BELVIDERE, PENTONVILLE.—The season at this court was terminated on Monday last by a grand display of skill by the élite of the racket world, professional and amateur. The play throughout the day was exceedingly fine between Bull and Mr. Caplin against Mr. Morris and Mr. Pittman, the two former players being the winners. The most interesting match of the day was, however, between George Erwood, probably now the most talented professional, and the junior winner of the Belvidere cup this season, certainly one of the finest amateurs in England; the former giving the latter what is technically called "the odd hand," that is, two hands to one of his own every alternate innings and two aces in addition, the amount of odds thus given being calculated at about one-half of the game. The contest was almost unparalleled for severity. The first game was won by Erwood by 11 to 7, the next by his opponent by 11 to 4. The fourth placed his opponent again upon an equality, the scoring being 11 to 7. A desperate struggle now ensued for the fifth and conquering game. The amateur led off most gallantly by gaining seven aces to Erwood's "love," or none. This touched Erwood's metal, and he went in, and, by his splendid play, brought himself again even with his opponent. The next three aces were gained by each party, neck and neck; the game, and consequently the match, standing as close as it possibly could do, namely, ten to each player. The last ace, which decided the match, was ultimately won by Erwood. His victory over such a first-rate amateur, against such heavy odds, is one of the best proofs that he has ever given of his great skill as a racket player. The closing of the season of the Belvidere court, however, like the closing of the season of many theatres, is more nominal than real. On Monday next the court will re-open, under the management of George Erwood, Mr. Rouse having very kindly given it up to him for his own benefit until next Easter, the commencement of the season of 1855. Erwood will therefore continue in daily attendance for the purpose of superintending the play and giving gratuitous instruction in the game to gentlemen. There will be little or no abatement in the play when the weather permits, as the winter is the finest part of the year for players, and spectators only need the addition of a top-coat to enable them to witness the fine play constantly exhibited in this court, as they have been enabled to do during the spring and autumn.

HOPE MUTUAL LIFE ASSURANCE.—On Thursday the Hope Mutual Life Assurance and Honesty Guarantee Society held their annual meeting at the chief office, Princes-street, Bank; Mr. Vane in the chair. The report stated that from the 1st of September to the 31st of August, 1854, 341 proposals had been offered for new assurances for sums exceeding £81,000, from which had been selected 234, covering risks of about £13,000, and yielding an annual income of £1,406. 14s. 9d.; while, in addition, a large amount of business had been declined, owing to the extreme nature of the risks proposed. The lives enrolled on the books of the company on the 1st of Sept. numbered 514 for life and endowment insurances, the average sum assured on each being about £227, and the average age thirty-seven years. The total sum assured exceeded £123,000, yielding an annual income of £5,000, and realised within the first twenty-nine months of the society's existence. The balance sheet showed an amount on either side of £20,519. 9s. 6d. The chairman having regretted the loss, from death, of two of their directors, and congratulated the shareholders on the satisfactory position of their affairs, moved the adoption of the report, which was seconded by Mr. Glenton, and carried unanimously. Some observations from several of the shareholders having been replied to by the chairman, the retiring directors and auditors were re-elected, and the proceedings, after thanks to the London and provincial medical officers, agents, directors, and general manager (Mr. Eide), terminated.

PROVINCIAL.

THE NEWCASTLE FIRES.

The coroner for Gateshead has examined Mr. William Woods, the managing director of the Newcastle Fire Assurance Company, who gave evidence as to the working of the engines. Several other witnesses were examined, chiefly in reference to the alleged storing of gunpowder in the vaults of the Hillgate warehouse. Two of the witnesses mentioned some alleged statements as to nine tons of gunpowder having been carried into the warehouse, but nothing positive upon the subject was elicited. Mr. Stocker, the coroner for Newcastle, has also opened an inquisition on the bodies of the sufferers who had died in the infirmary of that town. At this inquiry, also, a good deal was given upon the same point, but it was equally loose and inconclusive. Elizabeth Brown, widow, of Gateshead, said, her husband was killed by the explosion, and was found five days after. He was a labourer, and worked on the Quayside. Never knew him employed by any one but Mr. Davidson, miller, and Mr. Bertram, of Gateshead. About three weeks before his death, he came home one evening, and said he had been carrying some gunpowder in Hillgate. Since then he had frequently said that if Hillgate took fire the whole of Gateshead would be blown up. He did not say exactly where the gunpowder was stored. When the fire broke out she and her husband were in bed. He got up and went down towards Hillgate, as he expressed a desire to know if the sulphur was in danger of taking fire. At that time the warehouse was completely in the power of the flames. Witness saw no more of him till five days after, when his body was found in Grindon-chare.

Alexander Molteni, a cabinet-maker, said he had a shop in the lower part of Pilgrim-street. About half past three on Friday morning, the 6th inst., when he was in bed, he heard a terrific explosion which nearly threw him out of bed. His bed-room window looks towards Gateshead, and it was completely smashed. When he got down into his yard the sawpit was broken in, and near it he found several large black looking stones. In another part of the yard he found some of the timber was broken, and on looking round he discovered a very large stone, which had apparently done the damage. His parlour carpet was also burnt in several places. On Monday witness went to the insurance-office and saw Mr. Henry Wilson, who accompanied him to the yard and viewed the black stones before mentioned. Mr. Wilson examined the largest of the stones, and scraped from it a quantity of black powder, which he took away with him. A day or two afterwards he came with a police-officer and took charge of some of the other stones. Witness noticed that the peculiar smell attached to these stones strongly resembled that of gunpowder. Was quite certain that these stones must have come from the place of explosion.

At this stage of the proceedings the coroner said it would be advisable to make an adjournment for as long a period as possible, so that the gentlemen deputed by Lord Palmerston should have ample time to ascertain whether or no gunpowder had been an agent in the explosion. (The inquest was adjourned until Monday, Oct. 23.)

The Gateshead jury proceeded to the Felling Chemical Works to witness experiments elucidatory of the theory Mr. Pattinson had brought forward, as to the possibility of the explosion having been caused by steam, engendered by the contact of water with nitre, rendered incandescent by the burning sulphur. The experiments were conducted in the following manner:—Nine pounds of sulphur were put into an iron pot, fixed in the earth, and set fire to. Upon this six pounds of nitrate of soda, in a bag similar to that in which the material is usually contained, were placed, and the two thoroughly fused, an intensely white heat being produced. By means of a spout, about a quart of water was then poured into the pot, and a report followed equal to that of a piece of heavy ordnance. In order to test the amount of the force thus produced, the experiment was then tried near the mouth of a "drift" where some excavations are making. An iron pot was sunk and covered with a plate of iron weighing nearly two cwt. Upon this two or three cwt. of clay were piled, and the explosive process gone through. From the difficulty of judging of the exact period at which the water should be introduced, one or two failures occurred; but, even with this disadvantage, sufficient force was created to throw off the clay and to dislodge the iron plate. By one of these explosions a heavy iron bucket was thrown into the air a distance of fifty feet at least; stones and clay were scattered about, and the iron caldron was rent in two.—A meeting of the Newcastle Town Council has been held in the Guildhall, when a committee was appointed for the purpose of considering a plan of improvement in connection with the Quayside property destroyed and damaged by the late fire, and the committee was authorised to exercise the power which the corporation possesses to purchase all properties necessary for carrying out the plan of improvement. It was also resolved that public notice should be given of this resolution, in order to prevent unnecessary expenditure in rebuilding or repairing property. A letter from Mr. R. Gail, one of the largest builders in this district, was read, in which he suggested a plan for rebuilding the portion of the town destroyed by fire. Special thanks were voted to the military for their eminent services on the occasion; the vote to be communicated to Lord Hardinge through Major-General Arbuthnot, in order that it may be read at the head of every regiment in the kingdom.

DREADFUL MURDER AND ATTEMPTED SUICIDE.

Early on the morning of Thursday considerable excitement was created in the parish of Little Walsingham, a remote village, about ten miles north-west of Haddleigh, in this county, by a rumour that a woman had been murdered by her husband, and also that the murderer had afterwards made an attempt at self-destruction. The rumour, upon inquiry, proved too true, and we have been enabled, after visiting the place, to lay before our readers the following facts connected with the tragical occurrence; though, from the present precarious position of the murderer, and the almost immediate discovery of the crime, they will be of a very concise nature.

The name of the murderer is William Game, who is stated to be a man of very peculiar habits. For the last three years he has been subsisting on parochial relief, and the earnings of his wife, who went out nursing. He is a labourer by occupation, but has refused to work during the period he has been under relief. He is stated to be a man of desponding, sullen disposition, spending his time during the day by sleeping, and wandering in the fields; holding communication with no one, and always studiously avoiding all human intercourse or observation, as far as he was able. He had been twice married, like his unfortunate victim, each having a family when united. The unfortunate woman's age is stated to be about forty, and the murderer fifty-two. They had been married about seven years. Rumour speaks of their not living very happily together, as is, unfortunately, too frequently the case when two families live under one roof; and also that jealousy led to the commission of the act. It appears that about seven o'clock on Thursday morning, a neighbour was alarmed by hearing one of the children shriek violently, and upon going to ascertain the cause, found the murdered woman lying on the floor of the cottage, bathed in blood, and the husband in the act of cutting his own throat. The alarm was given, and, upon ascertaining that the murderer was still alive, a messenger was at once dispatched to Lavenham, about four miles distant, for medical assistance. Upon the arrival of the surgeon the poor woman's life was found to be extinct, but the wounds of the murderer were at once dressed, and every possible means taken to preserve life though with little hope, as the wound inflicted had completely severed the œsophagus. A guard was at once placed over him, as also a medical attendant, who remains upon the spot with him.

Information having been dispatched to the coroner, — Partridge, Esq., of Bury, an inquisition was held at the Swan Inn, at Little Walsingham, on Friday last, upon the body of the murdered woman, and at which the following are the principal points of evidence presented:—

Annis Newman deposed to living near the house of Game. On Thursday morning last, between six and seven o'clock, she heard one of Game's children shriek violently. She went out immediately to the back door of his house, and upon looking in saw the woman lying upon the floor of the cottage. Saw only her feet and legs, but not her face. Game was standing over her, bleeding very much from the throat. He had something in his hand, looking like a knife, but could not positively state what it was. Ran out immediately, and gave the alarm to Mr. Bouttell, who lives near. (This witness declined to say anything as to the terms on which deceased and her husband lived.) Both Game and his wife had been previously married, and had families, who lived in the house. Two children were also the result of this union. Game turned his head round when she first looked in at the door.

A witness named Stannard spoke to having seen the deceased about a quarter of an hour before the occurrence, carrying a pail of water, with which she entered the cottage. She never saw her afterwards alive.

Mr. Samuel Bouttell, farmer, stated that on the morning in question he saw the witness Newman coming up the road, crying out that a man was cutting his throat. He immediately went to Game's house. Upon entering the room he saw the woman lying upon the floor bleeding, but apparently dead. Her features did not appear the least distorted, and had witness not seen the wounds, he should only have supposed her to be in a fainting fit. He saw, however, there were wounds on the left side of the throat. About a yard from her body lay that of the murderer. He saw also that he was wounded in the throat, and bleeding profusely; the gurgling sound produced by the flow of blood he could distinctly hear. A long clasp knife, covered with blood, was lying between the two bodies. Witness, finding that Game still breathed, immediately dispatched a messenger on horseback to Lavenham, for medical assistance. After the lapse of about three-quarters of an hour, Mr. Barkway and his brother arrived, and attended to the wounds of the murderer. Witness had known Game for many years. He was peculiar and desponding in his habits, and very sullen. He had been receiving parish relief for nearly three years, and refused to follow any occupation. He was aided in support by his wife, who went out and attended upon people. Game always appeared to shun all society, and avoid observation. He passed his time in sleeping and roaming about the fields.

Was not aware of the cause of his despondency. It was generally thought that his malady was feigned, and that he was acting the hypocrite. There are two children by the last marriage, both of whom were present during the time the bloody deed was committed; one about six years of age, the other older.

From the medical evidence of Mr. J. J. Barkway, it appeared that upon being sent for by Mr. Bontell he and his brother came with all speed to the cottage where the tragical act was perpetrated, and upon going into the room found the man lying upon his left side and bleeding profusely from a wound in the throat, apparently inflicted by some sharp instrument. Upon further examination he discovered that the windpipe was completely severed, and the wound extended quite across the throat to the extent of several inches. The jugular vein was not injured. From the first he considered the case almost a hopeless one. The man was conveyed to bed, and he dressed the wound and stopped the bleeding, but a very great quantity of blood had been lost. There was only one cut, which was across the throat. The wound was not high enough to lacerate the jugular vein. Upon examining the body of the woman he discovered three stab wounds on the left side of the neck, and one in the fleshy part of the arm. One wound in the neck was about three inches deep, and completely severed the jugular vein and carotid artery. The oesophagus was also cut. He had no doubt but that the first wound which the murderer inflicted caused death. They were all stab wounds. The deepest penetrated quite into the mouth. Her death must have been instantaneous, as the wound penetrated the most vital parts, and appeared to have been with great force. All the wounds were on the left side of the body. His (witness's) brother had been in constant attendance upon the man since the occurrence. As far as his own opinion went he had no hope of his recovery.

The jury, after hearing the evidence, returned a verdict of wilful murder against William Game for the murder of his wife.

The instrument with which the foul deed was committed is a clasp-knife, about eight inches long, and when found by the murderer's side was covered with blood, which is now congealed upon it. It has been stated that this knife when last seen by one of the family was out of the handle, and Game admits having put the rivet in himself. It was stated by one of the children that when his father had stabbed his mother he sharpened the knife upon the floor previous to inflicting the wound upon his own person.

Since this occurrence Game has been perfectly conscious, and retains possession of all his reasoning faculties. Though admitting riveting the knife, he denies the existence of any premeditation. He states that if there had been 1,000 persons in the room he should have done it. He felt as if he was flying. This, doubtless, was the result of his melancholia. He, however, refused to state the cause which led him to the commission of the cruel act, and says no one shall ever know it; that it shall never be known.—Ipswich Express.

MILITIA.—The notice for the enrolment of the Irish militia appeared in the Dublin Gazette of Friday night; and it is supposed that some of the regiments will be immediately called into active service. The provincial journals are speculating on the difficulty in supplying the complement demanded for the ranks; for the "epanettes" candidates will be as plentiful as blackberries in November. To remedy the deficiency, it is hinted that the ballot will be resorted to. The following list contains the quotas to be raised in the several counties in Ireland:—

FRANCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Thursday, Oct. 19.

PARIS, for the season, remains unusually dull, a circumstance to be accounted for perhaps by the continued absence of news from Sebastopol, about which the greatest anxiety prevails. The delay in forwarding the accounts of killed and wounded from the banks of the Alma likewise adds something to the prevailing despondency, as giving a colour of probability to the mischievously exaggerated reports of the number of deaths among the wounded after the battle, the poisoning of the water by the Russians, and other fabulous horrors, which, though without a shadow of foundation, keep the public mind in a state of uneasiness and agitation.

It is seriously affirmed that their Majesties the Emperor and Empress proceed on a visit to Windsor in the course of next month; but everything is kept so mysteriously quiet about the Court that no one knows positively what the Emperor's movements are to be until the moment of their being put into execution. This report, however, is strengthened by many circumstances; and great is the curiosity to learn how the imperial couple are likely to be received, not only by their royal hosts, but by the populace of London, among whom it is suspected that some of the political refugees now there will contrive to make themselves conspicuously heard.

The cholera, which, in the first week in October, had fallen to zero, has, I am sorry to say, returned with renewed vigour. Last week the deaths rose above 200, and each day shows an increase in the number of its victims. Rumours are rife in political circles, which, if true, lead one to expect sharp work on the Rhenish frontier. It is stated that two-thirds of the powerful armament at Boulogne has received orders to strike its tents, and establish itself on observation in the department of Ardennes, and a great portion of the troops destined to form a camp near Versailles have been countermanded, and directed to march towards Strasbourg. The manufacture of shells, and other projectiles, is carried on at Metz and Vincennes with unprecedented activity, the artificers being employed eighteen hours a day. Added to this, all leave of absence is denied both to officers and men. This certainly looks as if mischief were brewing in the north.

The city was, perhaps, never before in such a disagreeable state for visitors. The police order that every house and building in the capital should be cleaned and renovated before the commencement of April next. The "Grande Exposition," commencing in May, has set the masons at work in every street; and scaffolding, stones, mortar, and brickbats, threaten the unlucky pedestrian with immolation at each step he takes. In the meantime, the buildings of the Louvre spring up apace, and will be a crowning beauty of that part of the town. Immediately opposite, in the Rue de Rivoli, near the Palais Royal, a noble mansion, or rather palace, is erecting, which is already taken by a go-ahead American, who intends to open it as an exact counterpart of the celebrated hotel at New York, known as Astor House. It is to be fitted up in a style of splendour unknown in any hotel either in London or Paris; and, judging from the proportions of the rooms, it will assuredly be most magnificent. You may judge of the expedition used in its construction by the fact that the workmen relieve each other day and night—the absence of daylight being supplied by two electric lights, which illuminate the works sufficiently to enable the workmen to carry on their operations. It resembles, however, a bright moonlight, rather than that of "Don Phœbus;" but the substitute is highly valuable, and must be set down as one of the practical triumphs of modern science.

Nothing further is known respecting the movements of Mlle. Cruvelli, whose flight was mentioned last week; but it is whispered that she left Paris so suddenly with a lover, the son of a man of immense wealth, Mr. G—, who, refusing his consent to their marriage, led to their flight to the regions of Gretna. How true all this may be it is difficult at present to say; all that is really known is, that the young man has been, for many months, unceasing in his attentions to her. The Minister of State, however, who is one of that tribe who are supposed to have the keenest sense of interest in pecuniary matters, no sooner heard of the fair wanderer's absence than he set the agents of the law to work to impound her furniture, wardrobe, and in fact all the property she had left in Paris, not forgetting her funds in the hands of M. Rothschild. The results of this step on the part of the Manager-Minister proved, at least, that Mlle. Cruvelli had not premeditated her journey; for neither funds, furniture, nor property of any kind, had been removed or touched. She went out at noon on Saturday, for a walk, after studying an air in Verdi's new opera. About four her femme de chambre received a note, directing her to meet the fugitive at eight o'clock, at the Northern Railway, with a small portmanteau, and a couple of gowns, &c. The servant packed up the clothes, thinking, as did the family, that merely a trip to some friend's in the vicinity of town was contemplated. At the hour named the girl went, and neither maid nor mistress afterwards returned. It must be added, that Mlle. Cruvelli found herself exceedingly unpleasant at the Grand Opera; the jealousy of other artistes, and the constant outcry of the journals in their interests that she was paid too highly, led her, some months since, to go to the manager and propose a friendly termination of their engagement. M. Roqueplan at once refused, and convinced her, by reference to the receipts whenever she sang, that her engagement was most beneficial to the theatre. The attacks, nevertheless, continued; and she was led to enter into negotiations with the director to pay, in some given time, the forfeit (100,000 francs) stipulated in her articles, and leave the theatre. This was also declined, and she had latterly become more reconciled to her position, from the success she expected in Verdi's new opera, and the promise of M. Meyerbeer to arrange her part in the long-talked-of "Africaine" in a manner exactly to suit her talents. To this it must be added that her success with the public was constant and undeviating, never attracting less than an 8,000 francs house, and often 10,000 and 11,000, a striking contrast with the usual receipts of the house on other nights—et voilà ce que c'est!

M. Gounod's long-promised opera, "La Nonne Sanglante," was produced at the Grand Opera last night; but, though got up with all the pomp of scenery and costume for which this theatre is celebrated, the character of the music strikes the ear as too scientific; and its execution being entrusted to such secondary performers as Gueymard and Madles. Pothot and Werthermberg, doubts may well be entertained of the permanence of its success. The poem, founded on an old German legend, is superior to the general run of operatic libretti, as will be seen by the following outline of the plot, which has the stuff in it for a striking melo-drama. A young German knight, Rudolf von Ludolf, and Agnes, the fair daughter of the Burggraf of Moldan, entertain for each other a passion malheureuse, their families being decidedly averse to the match, and, moreover, at war with each other. Rudolf hereupon imagines a stratagem to enable his mistress to escape from the paternal chateau. On a given night every year, the spectre of a woman, her long black hair dishevelled, and her white robes covered with blood, holding a dagger in her hand, and still wearing the conventual veil, passes along the passages of the gloomy old schloss, and disappears over the drawbridge. Such, at least, is the tradition. Rudolf, however, who is a kind of esprit fort, laughs at the story, and succeeds in persuading Agnes to assume the disguise of the bleeding nun; and, at midnight, he will await her on the pont-levis. Midnight comes—Rudolf impatiently attends the rendezvous. The spectre appears at the castle gate, and moves slowly down to the drawbridge. He mistakes the spectre for his Agnes, and passes the ring on her finger, which marks her as his bride. The spectre clings him in her arms, and, despite all his efforts, disappears with him into a subterranean vault; while the real Agnes, also in the garb of the Nonne Sanglante, reaches the postern. We are next introduced to the subterranean apartment, where the spectre-bride and her living husband are seen at a banquet, accompanied and waited upon by "lords and ladies bright," and attendants, whose glassy eyes and ghastly pallor bespeak them of another world. The nun, however, for a spectre, becomes somewhat communicative; and, in answer to his questions, acquaints Rudolf that his evident desire for a divorce "a mensu et thoro," will be realised as soon as he has expiated the murder committed on her person, the murderer being no other than his own father. Rudolf refuses to become a parricide; but, to cut a very long story short, M. Scribe takes the trouble off his hands, the parents of Agnes lay an ambush for young Rudolf into which his pire coupable falls by mistake, and with his death the mazes of the nun are pacified. The rival houses now conclude a treaty of peace and unity, and Agnes and Rudolf are married amid all the rejoicings those auspicious events call forth at the Grand Opera. The music is exactly of that character of which it is impossible (at least I find it so) to form a judgment without half a dozen hearings; I will only say of it, that it resembled the German far more than the Italian or French schools, and that it was immensely applauded by the friends of the author, with whom the house was crammed. The piece was of awful length, the performance lasting upwards of five hours and a half.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE MARSHAL ST. ARNAUD.

MARSEILLES, Oct. 12.

The war corvette Berthollet arrived here from Constantinople at seven o'clock yesterday morning. She steamed directly into the old dock, and took up the berth usually occupied by the Caradoc when she visits Marseilles. She neither fired nor received salutes. It soon became known, however, that she had on board the remains of the late Marshal de St. Arnaud, and all the ships in the harbour hoisted their ensigns half-mast high. The Berthollet brought likewise Madame de St. Arnaud, Dr. Cabrol, who attended the Marshal in his last moments, three aides-de-camp, General Yusuf, and his wife. The Berthollet continued to fire guns at an interval of thirty minutes until the body was removed. This occupied a considerable time, and at three o'clock General Rostolan, commander-in-chief of the department, attended by a numerous staff, proceeded on foot to the Berthollet. The entire garrison was under arms, and lined the road from the quay to the cathedral. All the municipal authorities arrived nearly at the same time as General Rostolan. The Bishop and his clergy remained on the quay to receive the body. The coffin was lowered into the long-boat, and was landed by the seamen of the Berthollet. The melancholy procession then commenced. A general officer walked after the coffin, carrying the Marshal's baton on a velvet cushion. The Marquis de Frazguier, son-in-law of the Marshal, and Captain Puyssagur, of the Hussars, followed as chief mourners. Next came General Rostolan and his staff, accompanied by the Sub-prefect and the Municipal Council, and the Mayor and his deputies. General Yusuf walked with Colonels de Grammont, Deplacé, and Henry, the Marshal's aides-de-camp. The procession followed the quays, the new port, and the wide road which leads to the cathedral. As it passed under Fort St. Jean that fortress saluted with its guns. When the coffin reached the cathedral it was placed on a catafalque erected in the centre of the church, and absolution was given. After the prayers for the dead were concluded, the coffin was placed in one of the chapels of the cathedral, where a chapel ardente had been prepared, and a guard of honour remained under arms all night. A solemn service was celebrated in the cathedral at eight o'clock this morning, at which the civil and military authorities assisted, after which the remains of the Marshal were carried in pomp from the cathedral to the railway terminus, the entire garrison being under arms. A special train was ready, which started at half-past nine o'clock for Paris. When we saw the Berthollet arrive, and reflected what a short period had elapsed since we saw Marshal de St. Arnaud embark in the same vessel, amid the cheers and salutations of an immense multitude, we called to mind another great captain. The late Sir Thomas Pieten embarked at Dover in June, 1815, to take the command of his division in Belgium, previous to the battle of Waterloo, and within eight days his corpse was landed at Dover, accompanied by a single aide-de-camp. Sir Thomas, more fortunate than Marshal de St. Arnaud, met a soldier's death on the field in the hour of victory, while the Marshal was cut off by a lingering disease before he had accomplished the object of his ambition—the capture of Sebastopol.

PARIS, Oct. 16.

In conformity with the official programme, the obsequies of Marshal de St. Arnaud were solemnised to-day in the chapel of the Invalides. The remains arrived this morning at the Lyons railway terminus, where they were deposited in a chapel ardente, under the guardianship of a detachment of select troops. So early as seven o'clock the bands of the various corps were heard as they descended the Boulevards in the direction of the Bastille. The weather was not ill-suited to the solemn occasion. The morning was chilly and dark, and though no rain fell, yet low thin clouds covered the sky as if with a funeral pall, and completely interrupted the beams of the sun. About half-past eight, two squadrons of cuirassiers proceeded in the same direction, and were followed by some detachments of light cavalry; and about nine, Marshal Maguau, wearing the full costume of his rank, with the Grand Cordon of the Legion of Honour, and mounted on a fine charger, rode down the Boulevards, followed by a numerous staff of general officers and aides-de-camp, and attended by an escort of chassateurs. The troops destined to form the cortège were massed at half-past nine at the railroad station; and soon after those who were to precede the hearse defiled before it. It was half-past ten o'clock when a salute of thirteen guns, from a battery stationed on the Place de la Bastille, gave notice that the hearse containing the body was in movement. The line marked out for the procession was the following:—The Rue de Lyon, the Boulevards, the Rue Royale, the Place de la Concorde, the Pont de la Concorde, the Quai d'Orsay, the Esplanade of the Invalides. At the head of the cortège were two general officers of the army of Paris, with their staffs, preceded by the full band of the 4th Regiment of Mounted Chassateurs. They were followed at a short distance by a squadron of light cavalry, with the colours of the regiment unfurled, two squadrons of cuirassiers, also with full band and colours, and a battery of artillery. These were followed by a battalion of Chassateurs; and the effect produced by the contrast of their dark uniforms, as the sombre mass appeared in the distance, was remarked by every one. Two battalions of infantry—one of light troops, the other of the line—with their drums muffled and their colours covered with erage, came next. A brigadier-general of the New Imperial Guard, with his staff, was followed by two squadrons of Guides, whose graceful uniforms relieved the monotonous appearance of the line; a battalion of Chassateurs of the Guard, with their wide blue pantaloons gathered in below the knee, and the lower part of the leg enclosed in leather greaves, and terminating in white gaiters, somewhat in the fashion of the Zouaves; and a battalion of the Voltigeurs of the Guard, dressed as nearly as possible like those of the first Empire, the shakos wound round with white cordons, and terminating in large tassels, and facings to match. At a distance the effect is not unpleasant, but when near the appearance of the men is cumbersome and heavy. The staff of Marshal Vaillant, Minister of War, and the Commander-in-Chief of the Army of Paris, also with his staff, the generals and other superior officers not in actual command in Paris, occupied the space between the Imperial Guard and the hearse. The hearse, which was not encumbered by excessive ornament, was drawn by six horses with housings of black cloth adorned with white lace; and the coffin was covered with a large pall worked with various devices. The corners of the pall were held by Generals Bourgon, Regnault de St. Jean d'Angleley, Levasseur, and de la Rue, who rode close to the funeral car. The aides-de-camp of the deceased Marshal, who had followed his remains from the scene of the battle in which he had taken so distinguished a part, followed immediately behind. Next came his charger, covered with dark housings embroidered with silver stars, and led by grooms in mourning, and followed by four mourners in full costume, bearing the Marshal's staff and other insignia. The carriage of the Grand Equerry, the office filled by the deceased in the household of the Emperor, the carriages containing the clergy and the members of his family, two state carriages, drawn each by six horses, with the Duke of Cambracres as Grand Master of the Ceremonies; General Rolin, Adjutant-General of the Palace; the Marquis de Toulangeon, orderly officer; Laumes, the Count of Montebello, Colonel de Beville, and Captain Merle, aides-de-camp and orderly officers of the Emperor, came after. The carriage of the Turkish Ambassador closed the file. The gendarmes of the Guard, the grenadiers of the Guard, the artillery of the Guard, a detachment of seamen belonging to the steamer, with an officer, two companies of Sappers, three battalions of the line and Light Infantry, one of Chasseurs, a squadron of the gendarmes of the Seine, and one of the Mounted Municipal Guard, followed, while two fine squadrons of Carabiniers, preceded by their band, and carrying their colours, closed the imposing procession. Of these various corps, composing the life of the French army, those of the new Imperial Guard, appearing, as they did for the first time, in their new uniforms, attracted the greatest attention. The squadrons of Guides, the Foot Chasseurs of the Guard, with their uniforms half Zouave, half Chasseur d'Afrique, the batteries of Horse Artillery, the Voltigeurs and Grenadiers, who only differ in some slight modifications of dress from the vieille de la ville, brought the mind irresistibly back to the days of the Empire in all its glory. As the Grenadiers passed every one was struck with the resemblance, not merely in costume but in person, to those with which the engravings and pictures of that period have made us familiar. When the body reached the gate of the Invalides, that portion of the army of Paris that had not yet paid military honours to the remains, defiled before it with their arms reversed, and under a salute of thirteen guns from a battery near the Quai d'Orsay. The body was received by General Count Orsano, Governor of the Invalides, and his staff. Eight sub-officers, wearing the decoration of the legion of honour, and selected from various regiments of the garrison of Paris, carried the coffin to the church through a double line of Invalides—mutilated old soldiers, the relics of the wars which France waged from the first revolution to the latest period. The Archbishop of Paris, attended by a large body of the clergy, received the coffin, which was placed on a rich and lofty catafalque raised in the middle of the nave, covered with a black pall, lined with ermine, and adorned with stars. The entire church was draped in black to the ground, divided into compartments by long bands of silver; between the choir and the tomb of the Emperor Napoleon rich tapestry, displaying a large silver cross. To the right and left, and immediately under the line of flags taken from the enemy in various wars, were emblazoned the names of the principal battles in which the deceased Marshal took a part. The church was filled with the various official bodies, and the galleries and aisles were crowded with spectators. The Governor of the Hotel, his staff, the generals and orderly officers of the Emperor and of Prince Jerome Napoleon occupied the left of the choir, and lower down the superior officers of the army and navy; and the members of the Council of State. On the right, and opposite the governor, the clergy were seated, and lower down on the same side the places were occupied by the Ministers, the members of the diplomatic corps, the deputies, and judges; and in the centre, round the catafalque, were Marshal Magnan, Admiral Mackau, Generals Lowestein, de la Rue, Levasseur, and Bourgon, and the English Ambassador. Close by was a space closed off for the deputation of officers representing the English army, one of whom was of the rank of general, and several wore the uniform of the Guards. On both sides near the entrance of the church those who had been specially invited to the ceremony had places allotted to them. In the centre of the church, from the entrance to near the altar, were stationed two lines of Invalides armed with lances. In the galleries above might be seen the members of the Marshal's family and the Sisters of Charity attached to the Invalides, and one of the side galleries was occupied by the band of the Guides. A considerable number of ladies, wearing deep mourning, were also present. The moment when the body entered the chapel, where this assemblage had collected was one of the most impressive kind. The chanting of the priests and the solemn and prolonged pealing of the organ, with the touching service for the dead, as prescribed by the ritual of the Roman Catholic Church, and which on this occasion was performed by the Archbishop of Paris, produced an effect which endures long after the conclusion of the service. The absolution was pronounced in solemn silence; but, in a moment after the last benediction was uttered, the peal of artillery from without announced that the religious ceremony was nearly over. The ceremony of sprinkling the coffin with holy water by all those who were present was performed in the usual manner. And now, when the last prayer was uttered, the last hymn chanted, and the last blessing given, the coffin was lowered into the vault behind the chapel by the same sub-officers who had deposited it on the catafalque. The thunder of artillery announced that Marshal St. Arnaud was laid in his last resting-place, and the numerous troops drawn up outside the walls and that lined the alleys surrounding the Invalides presented arms, and lowered their flags as a last salute to their chief. Soon after the troops began to leave the ground, and at half-past two the various corps were on their way to their respective barracks. The spectacle, on the whole, was as imposing as can well be imagined. The crowd was immense, both in the environs of the Invalides and on the whole line of the procession. All that military pomp could present to the inhabitants of the capital of France as the last tribute of honour to the chief whose energy enabled him to subdue to the last moment of existence the pangs of a cruel and incurable malady, or rather a complication of maladies, was this day done. Less honour could scarcely be paid to one who so largely participated in the first great victory gained by the allies over Russia, and which we confidently trust is but the forerunner of those other conquests which will very speedily follow.

Our Opera-Glass.

ADELPHI.—The new drama by Tom Parry, Esq., called "The Summer Storm" (to which we have made allusion on former occasions), was presented for the first time on Thursday night. Both in its construction and dialogue it bears the stamp of being the handiwork of an author skilled in such matters. There is no straining after effect, the incidents follow each other in natural order, and though many of them are novel and startling, they are not overdrawn. There is a smart sting about the dialogue, which keeps the audience alive; and which, in conjunction with the business of the piece, never allows the interest to flag. The following is the story of the drama:—Walter Atherstone (Mr. Parselle), to repair a broken fortune, and to liquidate certain debts of honour due to his friend Fitzwilliam (Mr. Selby), has become the accepted suitor of Mabel Vascourt (Miss Wyndham); and at the opening of the drama we find him and his by no means reputable friend on their way to Hallerton Place, where the nuptials of the parties are to be celebrated. A storm overtakes them; and, terrified almost to madness by the thunder and lightning, Walter's horse becomes restive and unmanageable, and ultimately dashes off at the top of its speed, bearing its rider in the direction of a deep and fearful pit. The circumstance has been witnessed by a young orphan girl, Clara (Mrs. Leigh Murray), while conversing with her friend Rachel Westbourne (Miss Woolgar). Prompted by a desire to save the life of the horseman, Clara rushes in the direction of the furious animal, and, waving her hat, changes the direction of his mad career—not, however, without hurt to herself. Walter is unscathed, and on approaching to thank his preserver, he beholds in the fainting form of Clara, her to whom he had pledged his troth and offered his hand. The recognition is mutual; but, knowing his errand, Clara repulses him with scorn. With a view to seek a meeting, Walter and Fitzwilliam follow in the direction of the wounded girl; but, missing their way, they arrive before the house of Ronald Westbourne (Mr. Leigh Murray). About this man there is a mystery dark and fearful. He returns home in the garb of a country labourer, after an expedition which has had for its aim the transmission to a confederate of a parcel of forged bank-notes. Step by step, we learn, has Westbourne descended the ladder of crime, urged on in his downward progress by a man who, under the mask of friendship, hid the tempter's wiles and the destroyer's fang. Reduced to the most abject poverty, he is hurried on to make his profession—that of an engraver—the means of criminally obtaining property, in order to fly to America with his only remaining child, Rachel. Having hastily thrown aside his rustic habit for the sober costume of a country gentleman, he encounters Fitzwilliam and Walter. At first he imagines his crime has been detected, and takes them for the officers of justice. Learning, however, the nature of their business, he informs them of their mistake, and they part; not, however, without Westbourne recognising in Fitzwilliam the tempter of his youth and inexperience; the latter, too, has some recollection of his quondam associate and gull. Westbourne determines to watch him, assumes again his disguise, and follows the parties to the farm-house of Bessy Busby (Mrs. Keely), where Clara has been taken after the accident. Mabel Vascourt is also at the farm, and Clara witnesses her interview with Walter. Ronald Westbourne arrives at the farm, and, alarmed at a conversation which takes place between Bessy and a Mr. Liptore (Mr. Paul Bedford)—a selfish grocer and constable, with a penchant for fishing, and a passion for Bessy, and who has taken a forged one-pound note—Ronald seeks out Rachel, who is of the party at the farm, and bids her hasten home unperceived with his overcoat, in the pocket of which is the parcel of forged notes. A dance is proposed by the rustics, and in the midst of it the storm breaks out with redoubled violence, and a hay-stack in the farmyard is struck by lightning—an effect, by the way, admirably contrived, the burning hay-stack being seen through the window of the farm. Ronald and Fitzwilliam meet after the excitement consequent upon the fire has subsided, and the latter immediately recognises Ronald, tells him of his early delinquencies and of his present crime, and threatens to expose him and declare his guilt unless an old debt of £400 be paid him forthwith. This sum is all that Ronald possesses, and is the only result of his crime. Dark thoughts enter the forger's brain, and with a malignant scowl he promises to hand over the money at his own house in the afternoon. In the meantime Walter Atherstone has written to Clara, begging an interview on the spot where she had saved his life. Requiring to the rendezvous, Walter sees Rachel at a distance, and believes her to be Clara from the straw-hat she wears, which she has received from Clara as a souvenir. He follows her, and, finding the house-door open, he enters. Ronald Westbourne, awaiting the coming of his destroyer, nerved to the perpetration of a direful deed—the murder of Fitzwilliam—by the means which he had prepared, to conceal all traces of his forgeries, hears the footsteps of Walter, which he mistakes for those of Fitzwilliam. The young man enters the chamber of the engraver, lighted only by the reflection of the dusky twilight. Astonished at not seeing any one, he is about to retrace his steps, when he finds that the door by which he entered has closed on the wall, so as to defy detection, and that the floor on which he stands is gradually receding from his feet. He madly screams for help, as, each instant, the yawning gulf beneath him widens, until, with a yell of despair, he falls headlong into the chasm. Rachel—who has heard the outcry, and who has been alarmed by her father's wildness of manner—rushes from the house only to see a confirmation of her fears—her father removing the body of Walter (who, in the dark, he still believes to be Fitzwilliam) to the chalk pits. She follows him in order to discover whose lifeless form it is. The packet of forged notes has in the meantime been found by Dicky Darcy (Mr. Keely) a bird-catcher, who as he expressively has it, "to wet 'em," has changed one of the notes at a public-house. Believing his fortune now made, he engages Simon Paul (Mr. J. Rogers) to act as his servant, and gives him a guinea. Their pleasure, however, is but of short duration, for Mr. Liptore suddenly pounces upon them, and in the name of the law seizes them. Clara, willing to hear what her false fleeting lover has to urge in extenuation, repairs to the chalk pits, soon after Westbourne has left the lifeless form of Walter. Indignant at not finding him there, the young girl passionately tears up the letter in which the interview is sought. Wandering to the brink of the pit, she discovers the body of Walter. Her cries for help bring a Bow street runner and a village constable to the spot, who have been on the look-out for the forgers. Her wild manner, and the finding of the letter and a piece of slate, with the name "Clara" scrawled on it, evidently by the dying man, induce the officers to arrest Clara as the perpetrator of the crime. To save her friend, and at the same time to shield her guilty father, Rachel, self-accused, delivers herself up as the murderess. Dicky Darcy and Simon, with hands tied behind them, are brought by Liptore to Bessy Busby's farm. She—a shrewd, discerning body, the very beau idéal of an English housewife—sets to work and examines the unfortunate culprits. From what she gleaned by this means she is led to infer that Fitzwilliam is the murderer, and when he comes to the farm armed with a brace of pistols—a precaution he has taken when seeking Ronald Westbourne—and having in his possession an engraver's needle, with which it is said Walter Atherstone has been wounded, she cleverly gets possession of the pistols, and gives him into custody as the murderer. The two unhappy girls are taken before Crofton Garworth (Mr. Gardin), the magistrate, who, on his examination of Clara, discovers a long-lost child. The innocence of Clara is made manifest by her own ingenuous statement of the circumstances which led to her being on the spot where the body of Walter was discovered. Not so it is with Rachel. Her silence concerning herself, and the protestations of her friend's innocence, raise suspicions in the mind of the magistrate. Westbourne, goaded to madness by the knowledge that his child is suffering for his crime, repairs to Hallerton Place, to inquire what has become of her. His wild, incoherent speech, leads Clara to believe that he is the guilty party. Overcome with terror at the sudden appearance of Fitzwilliam, he confesses his guilt, and, in his endeavour to escape, he is dashed to pieces by falling from a ruined balcony. With these leading features are interwoven minor incidents, which all tend to the one great culminating point of the drama. It is worthy of remark that, although the piece is very fully cast, there is not one extraneous character introduced; they all have an intimate connection with the main interest of the play, which could not be sustained by the omission of any one of them. In speaking of the artistes engaged, Mrs. Keely undoubtedly claims our first attention. As drawn by the author, Bessy Busby, is a full-length portrait of the bustling, active, country girl, as acted by Mrs. Keely, it was the gem of the piece. Her rattling good-humoured talk, her animation, and her general appearance, kept the stage alive whenever she made her appearance. As a contrast to this, were the acting of Mrs. Leigh Murray and Miss Woolgar; the one subdued and elegant, yet most eloquent in the rendering of a character where quiet sorrow was praying on the heart; the other impassioned, as moved by a more active grief, heightened by a terror of some impending yet undefined danger. Mr. Leigh Murray fully identified himself with the character of Ronald Westbourne; he was the picture of a careworn, guilty, and broken-spirited man. His rapid change of costume, too, heightened the interest of the character, which, notwithstanding its arduous nature, was perfectly delineated. Keely's bird-catcher was in his usual, quaint, dry, humorous style. His first introduction to the audience—in the meadow land, bird-catching—prepossessed them in favour of the character, which improved on further acquaintance. Paul Bedford in Liptore, the grocer, had a part suited to him to a nicety; he was at home in it—felt so, and appeared so. A scene in which he proposes himself as a husband for Bessy was full of fun, and was hailed with the heartiest laughter. Selby was the real impersonation of a bean in the time of the Regency; his dress and acting were both irreproachable. The scenery and effects are certainly most extraordinary, and may almost be termed the impossible made possible. The burning hayrick—before alluded to—the scene in Westbourne's house, and the Chalk-pits, were matchless in their completeness and effective character. A crowded house hailed the piece with acclamations, and made its success a matter of certainty. The author was called for at the conclusion; but Mr. Leigh Murray announced that he was not then in London, and intimated that the piece would be repeated every evening until further notice.

ASTLEY'S.—The lessee of this popular resort has announced the representation of a grand war spectacle, entitled "The Battle of the Alma," for production next Monday. We wish him hearty success, as we are given to understand the preparations made are of an extensive and costly description, and include the amalgamation of the ring and stage, in order to give a full scope to the mimical operations of our gallant troops, and those of our allies against the fell tyrant of the north. The advent of the spectacle is, moreover, marked by an example well worthy of extensive imitation. Mr. William Cooke intends giving the proceeds of the first night's performance to the suffering invalids of the allied army now in the hospitals of Scutari; and we have every confidence so generous an act will be readily responded to by an overflowing house.

MODEL OF ST. PETERSBURG.—A Belgian gentleman, a Mr. Westulienck, wishing to take advantage of the present curiosity of the British public with respect to all Russian matters, has brought over a large model of St. Petersburg—so large, indeed, that he has not been able to find a room capable of exhibiting it. The model, which is forty yards square, was, it appears, constructed in 1826, by command of the Emperor Alexander, and occupied 100 men three years in its construction, the cost being half-a-million of francs. It was at first exhibited by order of the Russian government in Vienna and Brussels, but ultimately fell by purchase into the hands of the present proprietor. From the fact of various portions of the city being placed in different rooms, we were unable to judge of the general effect, and moreover had to regret that neither a prominent feature, the Neva, was wanting in the largest section exhibited. However, all the public buildings, the Admiralty, the Etat Major, and the Winter Palace, seemed to be given with great accuracy, and an opportunity was afforded of judging of the general plan upon which Peter constructed the great western or inland section of his city.

LEISIC, Oct. 12.—Miss Stabbach, the English soprano, is here, being engaged for the series of concerts given by the Gewandhaus Society, under the direction of Herr Rietz, the successor of the lamented Mendelssohn; the orchestra, led by Herr David, is one of the finest in Europe. Miss Stabbach came off on her debut with flying colours, her fresh and beautiful voice telling with great effect in "Hear ye, Israel," from the Elijah, also in Haydn's canonet, "My mother bids me," a song of Sterndale Bennett's, and Wellington Guernsey's favourite ballad, "The Arab mother," she was loudly encored, and met with an enthusiastic reception, proving in this critical city that our countrywoman was not unworthy of an audience and of connoisseurs of the musical art, the first in Europe, to satisfy such demands rare qualities in the singer. The talents of Miss Stabbach, from her success at Leipzig, have been sought after in many other cities in Germany.

THEATRICALS IN AMERICA.—On the 11th ult. the new Boston theatre opened under very auspicious circumstances. Shakspeare's play of "The Merchant of Venice" has been produced with the utmost success. In the cast of characters we recognise the name of an actress who was here with us a great favourite, and who is on the other side of the Atlantic reaping "golden opinions." We allude to Mrs. Barrow, formerly Miss Julia Bennett, one of our leading actresses at the Haymarket and elsewhere. We select the following brief, though sincere criticism on her acting, in the difficult part of Portia, from the Spirit of the Times (New York):—"Mrs. Barrow's Portia was a most meritorious performance, and particularly in the trial scene. She gave the readings with as much feeling, delicacy, refinement of soul, taste, and good judgment, as I have seen displayed in the same character since the efforts of Fanny Kemble, who I regard as the greatest Portia I have ever witnessed upon our stage. Mrs. Barrow has appeared in a number of leading comedy parts since the theatre opened, which has established her a favourite with the audience; she is a sprightly, dashing comedy actress, and I will, at some future time, take occasion to speak of her efforts more in detail."

THE LATE SAMUEL PHILLIPS.

It is with much grief that we have to record the death of a gentleman long connected with the press and favourably known to the public by many acknowledged literary productions. Mr. Phillips received his education at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, and subsequently accepted the office of private tutor in a noble family. He travelled through most of the European countries, in the discharge of his duty to his employers, and when the connexion between them ceased there remained between them throughout his life feelings of mutual respect and regard. He afterwards came to London and adopted literature as a profession, and he is one of the few examples of men who, having followed it up with industry and perseverance, have been able to live and support a family in comfort and respectability, neither owing nor borrowing money. We do not assert that he was a genius or a great literary phenomenon, but he possessed very considerable eloquence and imagination, and, above all things, a sound judgment in literature which has rarely been surpassed. Had his physical strength been equal to his mental qualifications, we have little doubt that Mr. Phillips would have earned for himself a very considerable name in English literature; but the remarkable part of the story is that his work was accomplished with the hand of death upon him. For many years past he had been the doomed victim of consumption. At any hour of the day or night he might have been summoned away ere the ink had dried upon the line which he had commenced writing. But calmly and courageously, respecting himself and respecting others, he went through his daily toil, and, as we have before said, was enabled to live and maintain his family in comfort and respectability. The annals of English literature are certainly graced with the names of men of loftier genius than that of this gentleman, but upon the list there stands not the name of a more honourable and upright man. His career should not be without instruction to all men of letters. It may, perhaps, be superfluous for us to mention here that he was the author of Caleb Stokely and of other novels which have been much admired. He was also selected—no slight honour—as the fittest person to write the general handbook of the Crystal Palace. All who had the happiness of his acquaintance will long regret the loss of a most honourable, amiable, and intelligent friend and companion.—Times.

The English Prisoners in Russia, a Personal Narrative of the First Lieutenant of H.M.S. Tiger. By ALFRED ROYER, Lieut. R.N. Chapman and Hall.

One of the most exciting events of the present war is the destruction of her Majesty's ship Tiger, near Odessa, the sad fate of her commander, and the capture of her crew. We therefore receive with the greatest interest the account of the circumstances which led to this unfortunate affair, and the treatment received by the prisoners from their captors. Besides full details on those points, Lieutenant Royer (first Lieutenant of the Tiger) gives an excellent and lively description of his journey to St. Petersburg, and his interviews with the Emperor, Grand Duke Constantine, Prince Dolgorouki (minister of war), and other notabilities of the North. Not the least interesting of these interviews is that with the Grand Duke Constantine and the Grand Duchess, at Strelna:—

I was shown into a drawing-room, to await the arrival of the Grand Duke Constantine, who had not returned from Cronstadt. He fills the post of commander-in-chief of the navy, lately occupied by Prince Menselkoff, who has been sent to command the fleet at Sebastopol, and who may one day pay the penalty, in his person, of the war of which he was one of the principal instigators.

The walls of the drawing-room were covered with oil paintings, chiefly sea-views, by Russian artists; and there were many paintings laid against the chairs and sides of the room, and water-colour paintings lying on the table—the whole having an appearance of elegant negligence, by which I could see that it was used more as a private than as a state room. An examination of those works of art afforded me some occupation, while I could hear, in the distance, a band of music playing in the grounds. I was standing—leaning over a chair, and looking out of a window—with my back to the door, when I heard these words, in a pleasing tone, and in good English, with a slight foreign accent, "You are waiting for the Grand Duke, I suppose?" I turned round, and, a little to my confusion, saw three ladies standing close by me. I bowed respectfully to the lady in advance, and replied that I had been directed to meet his Imperial Highness at eight o'clock. The Grand Duchess—for it was no other who now honoured me with her conversation—was accompanied by two of her ladies-in-waiting. Her Imperial Highness said she had heard of my being very unwell, and expressed a hope that I was better. I replied that I had only risen from my bed in obedience to the commands of the Grand Duke. Her Imperial Highness then informed me that it was uncertain when the Grand Duke would return; and added, in the most naive manner, that I might know who was addressing me, "Even I do not know, and I am his wife!" I again bowed; when she said that she should certainly hear if he was detained, and would let me know. She recommended me, in the meanwhile, to wait, saying that she would send me some tea, and the last English newspapers, which had just come to hand. She then retired, with her attendants, by the door at which she entered, and soon after returned alone, with a copy of the Illustrated London News, which she handed to me, saying, "See! it has not yet been opened, and is the last number received."

It was addressed to the Grand Duke, and had not passed under the scrutiny of the censor—its destination being a safeguard from the mutilating scissors of that important functionary. Her Imperial Highness then retired, and I soon saw her in the garden, walking with her suite. She is a person of very pleasing appearance, rather above the middle height, of sweet and intellectual countenance, and decidedly pretty and engaging. She appeared to be about three-and-twenty, and was dressed with great simplicity, in white, with scarcely any ornament, except a few tasteful flowers in her white bonnet. The ladies who accompanied her were older than herself; and, although they were certainly beautiful, served to set off her Imperial Highness to advantage, by the gay colours of their dress, in contrast with the simplicity and elegance of her's. They did not speak while in the room, but as soon as they left I heard them say some words in French, and therefore concluded (as I had been assured) that this was the language of the Court.

Presently a servant entered with the usual tea apparatus—one teapot over another, as already described. I quite enjoyed this refreshing drink, in the thirst which I suffered from the fever, and it was very a propos, as I had to wait till ten o'clock. At this hour I heard a stir among the servants in the ante-room, and concluded that his Imperial Highness had arrived. I looked out of the window, and saw a gentleman in uniform, with a lady, coming through the garden, followed by an officer in an aide-de-camp's uniform, with another lady on his arm. Presently the Grand Duke entered alone, with his aide-de-camp, and, coming up to me, held out his hand to shake hands; he addressed me in English, hoped I was better, and regretted my having had to wait so long. He then motioned me to enter another apartment, the door of which had just been opened by one of the servants. Here we were left alone, and I was put quite at ease by his Imperial Highness's affability; he requested me to sit down, and ordered tea and wine, which were brought and set on two separate tables placed by us; he took some wine, and asked me to help myself, while he smoked the amber-mouthed pipe presented to him by the attendant.

The conversation first turned on the loss of the Tiger, into the details of which he entered minutely; he was well acquainted with them, having read the official report that I had addressed to the admiral from Odessa, a copy of which had been forwarded to him; in addition to this, he had the report of the authorities of that city relative to the circumstances that succeeded. He put a number of questions to me; among others he asked why we had not taken to our boats. I replied, that no naval officer ever thinks of abandoning his ship, and that we had defended the Tiger, hoping to the last to get her off the beach, until it was too late to escape in the boats.

His Imperial Highness spoke with earnestness of his voyages to England and in the Mediterranean, and referred to many naval officers whom he had met, naming them, and mentioning them in connection with circumstances that evinced his clear recollection of them.

Referring to Sir William Symonds, his Imperial Highness remarked that he believed the Russian three-decker the Twelve Apostles was a superior vessel to the Queen, which that officer had built; inasmuch as the defects said to exist in the latter had been corrected in the former: the stern, for instance, although not so slightly, was more useful and effective, as the guns could be fired at it; while it is doubtful whether the Queen could sustain the shock. He also added, that the Twelve Apostles, on repeated trials, had worked to windward, and overtaken their swiftest frigates.

His Imperial Highness spoke of many of the ships in both the English and French navies, comparing them with each other, and appearing to be quite au fait on maritime subjects.

I was much pleased with the ingenious manner in which he spoke of the exploits of the Arrogant and Ulcia. He said, "Have you heard what your countrymen have done?" I replied that I had not. "Well," said he, "of all bold and seamanlike operations, this of Captain Hall's—taking his steamer seven miles up a creek of intricate navigation, in an enemy's country—is the most daring I could have imagined; I cannot but admire just gallantry, even in an enemy."

The Life of Julius Caesar. By the Venerable JOHN WILLIAMS, A.M. G. Routledge and Co.

This is the best life of Caesar extant. The author gives the modern reader as truthful a view of the thoughts, words, and deeds of the "great Caesar," his opponents, and supporters, as could be presented within the limits of this work. He has represented facts, their causes and consequences, as they were represented either by Caesar himself and his contemporaries, or by ancient writers of a later day who had access to sources of information no longer in existence. This work fully sustains the great reputation of the Venerable Archdeacon of Cardigan, whose "Alexander the Great" and "Homers" are so well known and valued.

The Fables of John Gay. Illustrated by HARVEY, with an Original Memoir. Annotations and Introduction. By OCTAVIUS F. OWEN, M.A. George Routledge and Co.

As an expounder of morals through the instrumentality of fable, Gay will always retain a high place in the affections of his countrymen. The pride which revolts against reproof, uttered in plain language, generally yields to the obvious force of a fable, when clothed in such poetry as Gay displays in these beautiful fancies. The edition does ample justice to this great charm of the author. The memoir is admirable, and the numerous notes most valuable. It is also illustrated with 126 drawings by Harvey, beautifully engraved by the Dalziels.

Dogs, and their Management. Being a new plan of treating the animal, based upon a consideration of his natural temperament. By EDWARD MAYHEW, M.R.C.V.S. George Routledge and Co.

The proper treatment of dogs under disease, or during the various changes to which they are liable, is very little known, so much so that the author expresses his belief that Mr. Gowing, of Camden Town, is the only veterinarian, who, having carefully studied the pathology of the dog, devotes the time, attention, or care, which disease in every shape demands. The book is written with the hope of inducing other members of the profession to study the subject more carefully; it is put forth only as a step towards the point the author does not yet pretend to have fully attained. The study of years will be required to perfect that which is now commenced, and further experience may demand the retraction of many of the opinions herein advanced. The advantages which accompany the study of anatomy, physiology, and therapeutics have yet to be more largely applied to the diseases of the dog. The present work, therefore, although containing an immense amount of valuable information, the author modestly wishes to be accepted, only as a contribution to veterinary literature, and its contents to be viewed as doing nothing more than declaring the temporary convictions of one, who, desirous of truth, does not conceal that his mind is oppressed by many doubts. We cordially recommend the work to all who keep dogs. By availing themselves of the author's great knowledge on this subject, they may not only improve the breed of their animals, but save many valuable ones that might be lost through ignorance. The work is illustrated with numerous wood-cuts, depicting the character and position of the dog when suffering disease.

Ida May; a Story of Things Actual and Possible. By MARY LANGDON. Low and Co.

"Ida May" is a story exhibiting talent and interest, but, unfortunately, is too palpable an imitation for originality. In this we have a pretty white girl, instead of a negro, kidnapped and sold for a slave; but, very early in the book, she meets with a generous deliverer, who not only buys her, discovers her white lineage, and sets her at liberty, but gives her a fortune in consequence of her father's disappearance. She, at length, finds her father, marries her benefactor, liberates her slaves, and all go to live on a new theory; we do not learn from the book how it answered. "Ida May" is a very readable book, containing many well-drawn pictures of the Southern States, and will no doubt enjoy a share of popularity.

Outlines of Botany; being an Introduction to the Study of the Structure, Functions, Classification, and Distribution of Plants. By JOHN HUTTON BALFOUR, M.D. Adam and Charles Black.

This work admirably fulfils the intention of its author—viz., to "give the important facts of this science as briefly as possible, without entering into lengthened explanations. The structure and functions of plants are first considered, then their classification, and finally their distribution, both at the present day and at former epochs of the earth's history. A short glossary has been added, with a copious index."

Botany should always be included in our education. No study can lead the mind more readily to admire and reverence "Him who is wonderful in council and excellent in working." The observant powers of the student are accustomed to compare and discriminate objects, and it enforces accuracy of expression and description. Nor can we, in studying nature, forget that "earthly things must be received in subserviency to the great end of our being, and that science can only be prosecuted aright when it is viewed in the light of God's word."

Ince's Outlines of English History. J. GILBERT, Paternoster Row. Seventy-ninth Thousand.

We fully concur with the author of this really valuable little book, in the importance of having the outlines of every study accurately defined, and the leading points and bearings correctly acquired, before the minutiae are entered into. If the ground-work be clearly traced in early life, it will scarcely ever be obliterated; subsequent reading and conversation with the well-informed will supply materials for increasing knowledge.

In using this work—which is intended for the young—the compiler suggests that a reign, or a portion of a reign, be committed to memory as a lesson; and that afterwards the several events, of which the outline is given, be more fully investigated. This can be done by questioning the class prepared for examination by reference to their larger English histories. The pupil should furnish an account of every event, and, after finding the places in an atlas, briefly describe them by means of a gazetteer or geography. A biographical dictionary should always be near, so that the tutor should endeavour to make every study go hand-in-hand—chronology, geography, and history.

We are justified in saying that the contents of this little work are quite sufficient to carry out its object, nor do we know of any work on English history which contains so great an amount of information in so small a space.

A Guide to the Crystal Palace. By J. PHILLIPS. Bradbury and Evans.

The first edition of this work was produced at a time of severe pressure and under the most unfavourable circumstances. The greatest pains have been taken with this second edition, and it is now rendered as complete as possible, as will be seen on reference to the numerous excellent plans, maps, illustrations, &c. The whole has been most carefully revised, and many important additions made. Everything connected with the Crystal Palace is marvellous. This admirable volume of two hundred pages, beautifully illustrated, containing a large amount of valuable information, and published at one shilling, is another of its marvels. We have announced elsewhere the lamented death of the author.

Alice; or, The Mysteries. By Sir E. B. LYTTON, Bart. This is another volume added to the "Railway Library" by Routledge and Co. The works of Sir E. B. Lytton are too well known to require additional praise. The story of "Alice; or, The Mysteries," is one of those remarkable works of the imagination which haunt the mind of the reader for years; and although it has been abused, perhaps, as much as any book in the language, it has still held its ground, and in its present cheap form is likely to gain many additional admirers.

Gymnastics. Walton and Maberly, Upper Gower-street. A very useful pamphlet by Capt. Chioasso, Professor of Gymnastics at University College School. The professor will himself provide the work, if addressed at 38, Baker-street, Portman-square; and all booksellers can of course produce it for those who are anxious to be initiated in the mysteries of gymnastics.

THE COALITION GUIDE.—This volume forms a smart handbook for the fireside. It is full of illustrations of the political history of 1853-4, reprinted from the Press newspaper, and is intended to help as a guide to the origin and performances of the present Coalition Ministry, whom it certainly hits hard, collectively and individually. It is now selling, at the Press Office, 110, Strand, for a shilling, and will, no doubt, obtain a large circulation. Satire ever has certain charms, and very many, when they can well dive into it, especially for a few pence, care little whether their friends or their foes be attacked. We have nothing, in a sporting paper, to do with politics; and, therefore, taking "The Coalition Guide" as a mere hook, have no hesitation in saying it certainly deserves perusal and probably a reply. Cannot "All the Talents" dig up a few Aberdeen poets? We always prefer reading both sides of a question. We have laughed outright at much in the book before us, and that is saying not a little in its favour. By-and-by we may quote from it, for the delectation of our country friends.

MR. MURRAY AND THE MUSEUM AT MYTHENE.—(From the Amalthia, a paper published at Smyrna).—Mr. Grenville Murray, attached to the British embassy at Constantinople, who has been for the last eight months on special mission at Mythene, left some days since for a tour in the Archipelago. The departure of this noble and philanthropic Englishman has caused the greatest regret. But he has left ineffaceable traces of his presence amongst us, and has earned a most honest title to our common gratitude. During the three sojourns of the winter months he distributed food and clothes, weekly, among the poor, and his house became a rendezvous for hundreds of hungry people, who could find no relief elsewhere. He exerted his influence with the local authorities to redress any grievance, and pleaded the cause of the helpless with inexhaustible kindness. He contributed to our schools, distributed prizes to our scholars, and founded among us a museum of antiquities. In his public speeches he addressed to us the wisest and most temperate counsels, in the gentlest and most conciliatory language. Always polite, and easy of access to all who had need of him, he was as ready with labour as with good words, and conquered the respect and affection of great and small. Rarely has a man of a stranger nationality given such proofs of sympathy for a foreign people, and the remembrance of Mr. Grenville Murray will survive in the hearts of the Lesbians as long as his name, which is written in letters of gold on the walls of the museum which he has endowed.

ATTACK ON SEBASTOPOL BY STEAMERS.

Balaklava Bay, Oct. 2.

In Katscha Bay we lay, side by side, with another ship loaded with engineers' stores. At one o'clock p.m. this day, a steamer came down with the admiral's orders to take us into tow and help us on Balaklava Bay. We were among the first vessels that left Katscha Bay. Taken in tow, according to orders, as we rounded the headland, we heard a violent cannonade, and standing out about five miles from the coast we had a good and long view of the ships engaged in it. We found there were three of our steamers, evidently on duty off the harbour of Sebastopol. One of them, a very small fast vessel, had gone close in shore, evidently for the purpose of worrying the Russians in Fort Constantine. So beautifully did that small steamer succeed in her object, that gun after gun was fired from the fort (of which we just saw the bomb-proof roofs), and shell after shell, accompanied by long streaks of white smoke, rose up into the air and fell into the water, sometimes close to the steamer, and sometimes a good distance off. But the distance matters little in these cases, for "miss a foot or miss a mile" it comes all to the same thing. The small steamer—one of the smallest of the fleet—kept moving about, and played on the water like a trout. Whenever the Russian seemed tired of the game she came a little closer in and gave them one of her guns, which guns seemed ridiculously light, in opposition to the heavy metal of the Russians. Still she had her range, if the "Muscovs" had not, for one of her shells alighted on the roof of one of the buildings in Fort Constantine, as we could plainly see from the enormous cloud of dust and smoke it raised when it fell. The two other steamers—very heavy ones—were running close in shore, but nearer Sebastopol, and out of range of Fort Constantine. It struck me that they watched the play of the small steamer, for the purpose, perhaps, of noting the position and capabilities of Fort Constantine batteries. Passing further on, we came abreast the two entrances to Sebastopol harbour, and had a good view of the town and forts. The fortifications certainly look formidable, but in looking at them, I could not help recollecting that all the Czar's buildings and armaments show a good face, no matter how rotten they may be at the core. From all reports I have been enabled to collect from Prussian military engineers, who had the privilege of examining Sebastopol, I have come to the conclusion that the fortress, though strong, is not near so strong as is generally believed, or as its appearance would cause one to believe. It is true that the four-storied battery houses and round towers look exceedingly formidable. They certainly made that impression on some of our engineer officers, who like myself are on the sick-list, and who for that reason have for some time just been my companions on board this transport. But in looking at these formidable battery-houses and round towers, I could not forget that they are built of granite. The worthlessness of granite for the purposes of fortification has years ago been demonstrated by practical breaching experiments, made in various continental countries, and the results of those experiments have within the memory, and to the conviction of every one, been confirmed by the practical breaching experiments at the round tower of Bomarsund. Besides, the Prussian engineers whom I mentioned above (men of high standing and authority in their profession) found fault with the want of ventilation in the small vaulted chambers in which the guns stand, and they assert that after ten minutes' firing the gunners must either leave the guns or die from their own smoke. Some of the batteries, too, are so badly built, that they are in danger of destruction from the concussion of their own guns, without any material assistance from the guns of an enemy. I recollect all these statements as we passed the frowning tower and ominous-looking embrasures of Sebastopol, and came to the conclusion that it is a pity Admiral Dundas did not send before this some of his heavy-armed steamers to try what stuff the renowned Sebastopol batteries are made of. However, it will all be found out in good time, and that "good time" is coming.

The breaching and storming plan of the accelerated siege is still uppermost in the minds of the generals; and this morning, Oct. 2, we were glad to see the first detachment of sailors from the Sanspareil landed on the beach of Balaklava. Our most useful storming parties have always consisted of sailors, who are accustomed to do their work on difficult ground, and to whom the clambering up a breach or battery is mere child's play. The sailors, with their cutlasses, knives, pistols, and bundles instead of knapsacks, came on shore in great order, but also with great glee. They evidently liked the idea of a land march against Sebastopol.

THE LATE ARCTIC EXPEDITION.

COURT-MARTIAL ON CAPTAIN SIR EDWARD BELCHER.—SHERNESS, Thursday night.—The general court-martial on Captain Sir Edward Belcher, for the loss of the ships composing the Arctic squadron, re-assembled this morning on board the Waterloo, at Shererness. Admiral the Hon.

W. Gordon presided. At the conclusion of the evidence, and the reading of his defence by Sir E. Belcher, the court was ordered to be cleared, and after a lapse of about two hours it was re-opened. The Deputy Judge Advocate read the long formal finding of the court, which, after reciting the powers vested in the court to try Captain Sir Edward Belcher, C.B., for the loss of her Majesty's ships Assistance, Resolute, and Intrepid, were of opinion, (having heard the evidence in support of the charge, and the statement of Sir Edward Belcher, and having duly weighed the same and the premises), that Captain Kellett was justified in abandoning his ship from the orders he had received from Sir Edward Belcher, and that Sir Edward Belcher, in pursuance of the confidence vested in him, was so authorised to give, and had not gone beyond his orders, for abandoning those vessels; but the court were of opinion that, before doing so, he should have conferred with Capt. Kellett. Under those circumstances they acquitted Captain Sir Edward Belcher, C.B., of all blame; and he was acquitted accordingly. The President then handed to Sir Edward Belcher his sword, but without making any observation whatever. Sir Edward Belcher bowed on receiving the sword, and the court immediately afterwards broke up. The following address was presented to Commander Marsh, of her Majesty's ship Waterloo, by the crews of the vessels engaged in the Arctic squadrons, for the kindness they had experienced:—"We, the ships' companies forming the crews of the late Arctic expedition in search of Sir John Franklin, being desirous of acknowledging the disinterested kindness of Commander Marsh and the ship's company of her Majesty's ship Waterloo, during the period of the court-martial assembled on board that ship, take this opportunity of sincerely thanking Commander Marsh and the ship's company for their kindness to us on that occasion."

OMAR PASHA.

About forty miles from Finike, in the frontier district of Ogulni, there is a little village called Plaski. At the commencement of this century two brothers resided there, one of whom was a soldier, the other a priest of the schismatic Greek Church. The ecclesiastic must have been the better citizen of the two, at least he received, for the services he had done the state, the gold medal, while the breast of the soldier remained unadorned. In fact, the latter belonged to that class of soldiers whom their comrades look somewhat coldly on, and who never find any opportunity for distinguishing themselves. He was employed as a "civil lieutenant," as they are called on the frontier, or assistant in the chancellerie, first in the Ogulni, then in the Licia, district. After spoiling great quantities of paper, according to regulation, in both places, and wearing himself out with the eternal writing, he resigned his commission and disappeared from the same.

The two brothers bore the name of Lattas, and belonged to a poor family, which had a modest farm in the village of Plaski. The present Mushir, Omar Pasha, is the son of the soldier and civil lieutenant. He received the usual education of soldier's children, first at the military normal school in his own village, and then at the higher school at Thurm, near Carlsbad. In both of these schools he gained acquisitions which were of material service for his future advancement. In Plaski he was distinguished for his splendid handwriting; in Thurm, by his proficiency in mathematics. Both qualifications recommended him to his superiors, and were the cause of his not long remaining in his first grade as cadet in the Ogulni frontier regiment. He was attached to Major Korzei, of the engineers' corps, and employed by him partly as secretary and partly in road-making. A real soldier cannot be happy with such occupations. Young Lattas neglected the duties, which were repugnant to him; thence had many quarrels with his superior officer, who had procured his promotion, and who accused him of ingratitude. He put an end to this by sending in his resignation. Whether it was accepted, or whether he left without permission, is the subject of various rumours. The first is the more probable of the two, as Lattas went, after turning his back on the road-making, to Zara, and remained for a considerable time in this capital of Austrian Dalmatia.

As Zara did not offer him what he was seeking, he bent his steps towards Turkish Bosnia. Lattas found, as a compensation for what he had given up, nothing but a situation with a Turkish tradesman, and a very subordinate one. It must have been, as is evinced by the fact that he embraced Islamism, in order to be adapted for the office of a tailor. He was now called Omar, learned the language, manners, and customs of the Turks, and was clever enough to cause his new co-religionists to forget that he had so recently been a Gleaner.

After a considerable lapse of time, the Turkish merchant, in whose service Omar was, sent his children to Constantinople in the charge of the tutor. Thus the ambitious renegade arrived at Stamboul. As a soldier, he sought acquaintances and patrons in military circles, received encouragement, gave up his situation with the merchant, and became teacher at one of the new military schools.

His handwriting, one of the slightest of his qualifications, was his principal recommendation. But it was the year 1833; the reforms were pressed on more hastily than ever, and thus it was more inevitable that Omar must find scope to display his brilliant abilities. From the moment when the old Seraskier, Chosrew Pasha, became acquainted with him and made him his adjutant, he rapidly advanced. Through Chosrew, Omar was introduced to the Sultan, and appointed by the latter writing-master to his son, the present Abdul-Medjid.

Chosrew was the guardian of one of the richest ladies in Constantinople, the daughter of an Agha of the Janissaries, whom he had himself ordered to be executed after the sanguinary rebellion of those troops. This lady he gave to Omar as a wife, and if report is not false, the latter presented her spouse with two companions of her own selection. In the next year he was promoted to a majority, and took the most active part in the labours by which the re-organisation of the army was effected.

At first he served under the immediate orders of the Polish General Chrzanoski, who had at that time the direction of military affairs at Constantinople. Then he was employed in topographical studies for a couple of years, on the Danubian Principalities and in Bulgaria. The knowledge of the terrain, which he acquired in this manner, is of very great service to him in the present war. There is not through the whole of the seat of war on the Danube a single forest, stream, morass, or valuable position, with which Omar Pasha is not intimately acquainted.

He received a more important command for the first time by the occasion of the Syrian disturbances. Both in that country, as well as in Albania, and Kurdistan, he distinguished himself greatly. Whether it was merely new opposition and attempts at rebellion on the part of the old Turkish party, or of disobedient tribes, which occasioned the interference of the Porte, the ultimate design was always their protection, and it was this last part of his commission which Omar Pasha attended to with the utmost zeal.

In the revolutionary year, 1848, he first formed the acquaintance of the Russians. An insurrection in Wallachia rendered it necessary for the country to be held simultaneously by the Emperor and the Sultan, and Omar Pasha commanded the Turkish division, while General Loders was at the head of the Russian troops. Through the position of the country there was much that raised the Turks higher than the Russians in the estimation of the people, but a great share of the popularity which the Turkish Government then enjoyed was due to Omar Pasha. He secured for the Wallachians all the liberty which could possibly be saved, and certainly obtained by it the reputation of being imbued with revolutionary sentiments, which, however, is not of much consequence in Turkey.

This reputation he chiefly acquired by a circumstance which only interested Omar Pasha so far that he was obliged to show that the Sultan, and not the Czar, was master of the country. A band of gipsies had played the "Marseillaise" and other national melodies, and had been summarily punished by the Russians for it. As soon as Omar Pasha heard of it, he ordered all the bands to learn these tunes. Whenever the Turkish troops marched out to exercise before Binechet, and passed the palace occupied by General Loders, he had an opportunity of hearing these odious revolutionary sounds. The effect was soon visible; when the Russian representations, at first clothed in very rough language, and then pitched in a milder key, remained ineffectual, they comprehended the lesson which Omar Pasha read them, and placed some limits to the exercise of their supremacy in police matters.

The two years 1848 and 1849 passed without anything remarkable being effected by Omar Pasha. The negotiations relative to the fugitives, in which his name was repeatedly mentioned, only affected him very remotely. To wake up for this, the year 1851 was all the more brilliant. Once again the stirring howls of the Mohammedan faith, who had always felt outraged by the reforms of the two last Sultans, and the alleviation of the burdens of their Christian countrymen, took up arms, and effected what they strove for in 1846 under the "Emperor with the green arm," the independent position of Bosnia, somewhat after the fashion of Serbia. The indolent Tahir Pasha took such unskillful measures, as if he were purposely playing into the hands of the insurgents, and consequently matters attained to such a pitch, that Hissaz and the whole of Carnia were persuaded to rebel. At this climax of the insurrection, Omar Pasha appeared with unlimited authority and fresh troops.

From this moment the cause of the insurgents began to pine away. Marching with great rapidity on all the strategically important points, Omar led his cohorts through the hands of his opponents, beat them in detail, and suppressed the rebellion in a very short time. The oppressed Christians leaped again, for Omar Pasha kept his troops in strict discipline, and sought to establish a more settled state of things. The address which the Franciscan Fathers offered him in gratitude, was the expression of the general opinion.

The campaign against Montenegro, which took place in 1852, has caused many unfair opinions to be formed about Omar Pasha, but not justly so. It was not his fault that he was compelled to commence the war in the worst possible season, in December, that his troops were badly fed, and that he made but slow progress against a brave nation fighting in the very best position. In all that he personally arranged, and did, we perceive fresh proofs of his distinguished talents. The three points from which he caused his troops to advance were so happily chosen, that, at the very outset, he cut off several districts of Montenegro from the main land, and forced the enemy to divide their troops, which was most unfavourable for him. It was, perhaps, fortunate for him that the Austrian insurrection interrupted the war just at the moment when Omar Pasha was approaching the celebrated defiles which lead into the heart of the country. It is very possible that he would have experienced no better fortune within them than several Russian generals had done before him.

In the war which at this moment is being carried on on the banks of the Danube, Omar Pasha has most brilliantly refuted the croaking predictions of the friends of Russia. His position from the Black Sea to the Austrian frontier has gained the approbation of all military men. How correctly he judged when he selected Little Wallachia as the point of attack, and made Kalafat the deu-à-pont of Whiffin, is proved by the desperate exertions made by the Russians to regain this position. There is a certain timeliness by which it can be discovered which of two commanders is superior in talent. It is the one who through his operations undertakes the management of the war, and forces his opponent to follow his movements. Omar Pasha has undoubtedly acted this part.

In another point he has also shown his superiority. He has never suffered himself to be deceived by pretended attacks, which was frequently the case on the Russian side, more especially when Omar Pasha intended to take up his permanent position at Kalafat, and crossed the Danube and attacked the Russians at other points, so that they neglected the position which it was so important to their clever opponent to obtain.

In addition to this, his management of the war is based on a very correct estimate of what the troops on either side are able to do. He chooses those modes of fighting in which the Turks are superior to the Russians. The Turkish soldier is a good arsouler, which the Russian never learns, for he is nothing but a machine. The Turkish soldier defends walls and intrenchments with a love of the sport, in which he is only probably surpassed by the Spaniards; while the Russian is perfectly helpless in an attack on strong places. In accordance with these qualities of the opponent troops, Omar Pasha regulates his plan of campaign, carries on an uninterrupted little war, and intrenches himself when larger bodies are marched against him.

We are well aware that he has effected by this. The constant skirmishes fatigue the Russians, and cause them to lose many soldiers, as they are unsuccessful in their attacks upon Omar Pasha's intrenched positions. They were defeated at Oltuzta, and were obliged to give up the investment of Kalafat. What can we think of the boasted superiority of the Russian troops, when we see that their generals are obliged to open a regular siege against common earth redoubts and hurriedly-intrenched villages?

Omar Pasha's personal appearance is very striking. He is not tall, but well-built and powerful, and possesses that true martial exterior, which is so attractive to soldiers and women. He is no admirer of European fashions, and in his behaviour to Europeans it is to be seen, that when he employs strangers, necessity, and not his will, forces him to do it. The good qualities of the Turks—honesty, disinterestedness, and liberality—are perfectly represented in him. His military talents, which are united to an innate instinct for the trade of war, are undoubtedly of a very high character. Of all the armies which the Turks have marched into the field during the last few years, those commanded by him were the only ones in which discipline was kept up, and the want of a sufficient number of good officers and subalterns was not so perceptible. His troops obey him, and obey his commands with the most unbounded confidence. The fact of his displaying the most chivalrous bravery on all occasions, has naturally done much in gaining him this affection.

He speaks several languages besides Turkish, Serbian, German, and Italian, with equal fluency. In his mode of life he has retained much peculiar to Europeans. His house is furnished entirely after the German fashion, and he drinks wine publicly and without any scruple. Very recently, too, he abolished his harem, and lives with only one wife, a native of Transylvania, whom he allows the liberty of European women.

MARTIAL LAW IN CALIFORNIA.—Some of the members of the volunteer corps at Yerba Buena made their appearance one day on parade, in a state bordering on intoxication. They were ordered to fall into line. All obeyed the order but one, a Mr. P., well known to those who lived here in '45. Mr. P. backed up against one of the posts in front of the house before which Captain H. had drawn up his men. This was in Kearny-street, between Clay and Washington. "Fall into ranks!" cried the captain. "I could not entertain the proposition to fall," said Mr. P.; "can't leave this post, Sir." "Fall into the ranks!" again cried the captain; "if you don't, I will take off your head, Sir!" "Take it, Sir," said P.; "it is at your service." The captain stopped back and drew his sword, which happened to be a long dragon sword. "I say once more," cried the captain, at the tip of his voice, "Fall in! If you don't, at the words one, two, and three, I will take off your head." Mr. P. remained immovable. The captain raised his sword in the face of the whole company, and in the most solemn manner whirled it around his head, pronouncing, "one, two," and at "three" he cut the huge uniform of P. in two, just grazing the tip of his head. "There, Sir, is a specimen of what I can do. The next cut, off goes your head. Will you fall into the ranks now, Sir?" "Yes, Sir, now," said P.; "I am perfectly satisfied." The hat was cut in two as clean as if it had been done by a razor, and P. never winked an eye when H. made the stroke.—California Monthly Pioneer.

Wits and Spars.

THE CHARACTER OF THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA AS A SOLDIER.—The following sketch of the Czar we copy from the new work on "Russia and its People," by Count A. De Garowski:—"The present Emperor was born on the 6th July, 1796, and is thus 55 years old. He married on the 1st July, 1817, the Princess of Prussia, sister of the reigning King. She was born on the 13th July 1798. They have six living children—four sons and two daughters. The eldest son, the hereditary Grand Duke, was born on the 29th April, 1818, and was married on the 28th April, 1841, a princess of the house of Darmstadt. They have at present four children. Much has been said about the external personal appearance of Nicholas. He is as vain-glorious of it as any dandy. The glance of his large blue-greenish, crystal-like, limpid eyes, pierces through and through as with the points of two freezing icicles. A cold pang seizes one's whole being on receiving their full glare. Nicholas was not destined from his childhood to ascend the Imperial throne; but his education was not neglected. His mother, a sensible, honest, and virtuous German housewife of the royal house of Württemberg, directed it, as that of his younger brother Michael. The two older brothers, Alexander and Constantine, were brought up under the care of the Empress Catherine, and received from a Swiss, La Harpe, the French encyclopedical, superficial education, at that time in fashion. Among the tutors of Nicholas was the celebrated economist, Storch; and notions sown by his strong mind took root in that of his youthful pupil, huddling forth to a certain degree during his whole life. The great duel between Napoleon and Russia soon made the mechanism of armies one of the principal pursuits of the young Grand Duke, and other studies were rather neglected. I may observe here, that there is a kind of mental disease in this family, especially since the unhappy Peter III., through which they all regard it as their vocation to be good corporals. All of them have devoted, and devote, as much time as possible to martyring the soldiers with daily exercises and all the petty manoeuvres of a parade. But not one in the whole family has ever displayed any highly military capacity whatever. Nicholas, however able he may be, as was his father and his three brothers, to detect a button which is not in its right place on the uniform of a single soldier drawn up in line with hundreds of others, or any other fault in the equipment—could never measure by his eye the reach of a gun or the distance accomplished by a bullet. Thus, during the campaign against the Turks in 1828, he sought to earn military laurels by the sureness of his eye in matters of siege and fortification. The Russian troops surrounded the impregnable fortress of Schumla, the key to the Balkan Mountains. Nicholas pointed out the spot where the heavy ordnance was to be posted to open the fire on the fortress—and the bullets fell half-way from the walls. His capacity as commander has never risen above that of directing the various manoeuvres of a single regiment of cavalry. The movements of two regiments combined are too much for him. In the sham fights which every year serve for his pastime, and where 150,000 men are often unmercifully employed in the hottest season, with immense cost and loss of time, the Emperor used sometimes to take the command of one-half of the army, but always to make the most unpardonable blunders, and to be out-manoeuvred by his opponent. He has even been taken prisoner with his staff at a dinner-table; and now, taught by experience, he takes his seat among the judges of the camp. An able general and had courtier, named Murakioff, who, on one occasion, thus took the Emperor prisoner, very soon afterwards fell into disgrace, and is no longer trusted with any military command. During the above-mentioned campaign in Turkey Nicholas joined the army, commanded by Field-Marshal Prince Wittgenstein, interfering continually, as we have been told, with its military operations. To this untimely interference the unhappy results of this first campaign were due. The next year the command was transferred to Field-marshal Dybitch. The first condition in accepting it was, that both the Imperial brothers, Nicholas and Michael, should remain at home and keep quiet. Nicholas, grown wise by the previous year's experience, acceded to the demand. The results are known. The army crossed the Balkan, took Adrianople, and there the treaty, bearing that name, was signed. Dybitch earned the surname of Zabalkanski (the crosser of the Balkan). Since this lesson, Nicholas has never joined an army personally on any theatre of war, either in Poland or Hungary. Now he believes himself to be a great naval commander. From the peace of 1815 to the time of ascending the throne in 1825, he devoted his time almost exclusively to the military exercises, but was known only as the inventor of an ambulatory kitchen stove for the use of the camp."

A CRITICAL MOMENT.—Scarcely had the Arabs quitted the place of discussion to reach the position I had assigned them, as one of observation, than a lion came out of the wood and made right towards me—a second followed at a distance of fifty paces. I was seated on a rock which commanded the position, and which could only be reached by steps intersected with crevices. The Arab was by my side; I took my Devisme rifle and cocked it. I also cocked my one-barrelled rifle, and left it in the man's hands, after having encouraged him, and told him to hand it to me the moment I had fired twice. The first lion having vaulted upon the lower steps of the rock, he stopped; I was just going to pull the trigger, when he turned to look at his comrade. This movement presented me the shoulder so advantageously that I no longer hesitated. He fell, roaring at the discharge, tried to get up, but fell down again. Both shoulders were broken. The second lion was already at the foot of the rock, his tail up; he received the first shot a little behind the shoulder, when about ten paces from his companion; he was staggered for a moment, but soon recovered himself, and with a prodigious spring, reached the very rock on which I stood. To take the rifle out of the hands of the trembling Arab, to aim at the lion's temple, to fire and kill it on the spot at a distance of barely four paces, was done and accomplished—thanks to the protection of St. Hubert, my patron—in less time than it takes me to write it down.—Adventures of M. Jules Gerard, the Algerian Lion Hunter.

IS FRIDAY AN UNLUCKY DAY?—From time immemorial Friday has been frowned upon as a day of ill omen. And though the prejudice is less prevalent now than it has been of yore, when superstition had general sway, yet there are many even in this matter-of-fact age of ours who would hesitate on a day so suspicious to begin an undertaking of momentous import. And how many brave mariners, whose hearts unquailing could meet the wildest fury of their ocean home, would blanch to oven bend their sails on Friday! Let us, to show with how much reason this feeling is indulged, let us examine the following important facts in connection with our new settlement and greatness as a nation, and we will see how little cause we Americans have to dread the fatal day.—On Friday, Aug. 21, 1492, Christopher Columbus sailed on his great voyage of discovery. On Friday, Oct. 12, 1492, he first discovered land. On Friday, Jan. 4, 1493, he sailed on his return to Spain, which, if he had not reached in safety, the happy result would never have been known which led to the settlement on this vast continent. On Friday, March 15, 1493, he arrived at Palos in safety. On Friday Nov. 22, 1493, he arrived at Hispaniola, on his second voyage to America.

On Friday, June 13, 1494, he, though unknown to himself, discovered the continent of America. On Friday, March 5, 1496, Henry VII. of England gave to John Cabot his commission, which led to the discovery of North America. This is the first American state paper in England. On Friday, Sept. 7, 1565, Melendez founded St Augustine, the oldest town in the United States by more than 10 years. On Friday, Nov. 10, 1620, the Mayflower, with the Pilgrims, made the harbour of Province Town; and on the same day they signed that august compact, the forerunner of our present glorious constitution. On Friday, Dec. 22, 1620, the Pilgrims made their final landing at Plymouth Rock. On Friday, Feb. 22, George Washington, the father of American freedom, was born. On Friday, June 16, Bunker's Hill was seized and fortified. On Friday, Oct. 7, 1777, the surrender of Saratoga was made, which had such power and influence in inducing France to declare for our cause. On Friday, Sep. 22, 1780, the treason of Arnold was laid bare, which saved us from destruction. On Friday, Oct. 19, 1781, the surrender at Yorktown, the crowning glory of the American arms, occurred. On Friday, July 7, 1776, the motion in Congress was made by John Adams, seconded by Richard Henry Lee, that the United States Colonies were, and of right ought to be, free and independent. Thus, by numerous examples, we see that, however it may be with foreign nations, Americans need never dread to begin on Friday any undertaking however momentous it may be.—Norfolk (U. S.) Beacon.

A CUBAN MILKMAN.—Few matters strike the observant stranger with a stronger sense of their peculiarity than the Cuban milkman's mode of supplying that necessary aliment to his town or city customers. He has no cart filled with shining cans, and they in turn filled with milk (or what purports to be milk, but which is apt strongly to savour of cockituate or croton); so there can be no deception as to the genuine character of the article which he supplies. Driving his sober kine from door to door, he deliberately milks just the quantity required by each customer, delivers it, and drives on to the next. The patient animal becomes as conversant with the residence of her master's customers as he himself, and stops unbidden at regular intervals before the proper houses, often followed by a pretty little calf, which amuses itself by gazing at the process, while it wears a leathern muzzle to prevent its interference with the supply of milk intended for another quarter. There are doubtless two good reasons for this mode of delivering milk in Havana and the large towns in Cuba. First, there can be no diluting of the article; and second, it is sure to be sweet and fresh, this latter being a particular desideratum in a climate where milk without ice can be kept only a brief period without spoiling. Of course the effect upon the animal is by no means salutary, and a Cuban cow gives but about one-third as much milk as our own. Goats are driven about and milked in the same manner.—Ballou's History of Cuba.

PERPETUAL MOTION.—Mr. J. G. Hendrickson, of New Jersey, announces the discovery of the principle of perpetual motion. The success is obtained by the means of arms and balls attached to a cylinder so as to keep the extra weight always on one side, therefore to give the cylinder a constant inclination to turn round. The machine requires no starting; take away the blocks, and it goes off "like a thing of life." The Journal of Commerce says of it:—"The model was in our office yesterday, and attached to some clockwork, which it turned without once stopping to breathe. We see no reason why it should not go until worn out. After a careful examination, we can safely say, in all seriousness, that the propelling power is self-contained and self-adjusting, and gives a sufficient active force to carry ordinary clockwork, and all without any winding up or replenishing."

LEADEN
PIPES.

"The above engraving represents accurately a section of a leaden pipe, which was employed for a short time in conveying water from a well on the grounds of Mr. DICK, of Bouchurch, Isle of Wight. The original section of pipe is 8 1/2 in. long, 2 1/2 in. diameter, and 5-16 in. thick. A great part of the internal surface is corroded by the action of the water; but, as shown in the drawing, four deep excavations have been cut. The water has cut these deep pits almost through the pipe, and not only upon the portion which we have illustrated, but have formed similar channels throughout the entire length."—Expositor.

March 10, 1872.

"In reply to your letter received this morning, respecting the Gutta Percha Tubing for pump service, I can state, with much satisfaction, it answers perfectly. Many builders and other persons I have lately examined it, and there is not the least apparent difference since the first laying down, now several years; and I am informed that it is to be adopted generally in the houses that are being erected here."

HEALTH RESTORED.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—An Extraordinary Cure of Dropsy, after suffering for eighteen months.

Copy of a Letter from Mr. G. Beligs, Chemist, Goole, dated February 15th, 1873.

TO PROFESSOR HOLLOWAY.

SIR,—I have much pleasure in informing you of a most surprising cure of dropsy, recently effected by your valuable medicines. Captain Jackson, of this place, was afflicted with dropsy for upwards of eighteen months, to such an extent that it caused his body and limbs to be much swollen, and water poured as it were from his skin, so that a daily change of apparel became necessary. Notwithstanding the various remedies tried, and the different medical men consulted, all was of no avail, until he commenced using your Pills, by which, and by strict attention to the printed directions, he was effectually cured, and his health perfectly re-established. If you deem this worthy of publicity, you are at liberty to use it.

I am, Sir, yours respectfully,

(Signed) G. BRIGGS.

Sold at the Establishment of Professor HOLLOWAY, 271, Strand (near Temple-bar), London, and by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicines throughout the civilised world, at the following prices:—1s., 1 lb., 2s. 6d., 1s. 6d., 1s., 2s., and 3s. each box.

N.B.—Directions for the guidance of patients in every disorder are annexed to each box.

THE FIELD OF WAR.

BATTLE OF THE ALMA.

THANKS TO THE TROOPS.

Two days after the battle of Alma the regiments were formed up in square, and the general order of Lord Raglan, praising them for the undaunted courage they had displayed on the bloody field of September the 20th, read to them. At the same time the French army began moving along our front to take up a position to the left, and the rimas and cheers which were exchanged between the armies were beyond description. It was a moment of general enthusiasm, and the two armies looked like great masses of waving, noisy and shakoed. Afterwards the duke called all the officers of his division together, and speaking in a warm, straightforward manner, thanked them for the support he had received while storming the redoubt at Alma. As the Fusilier Guards had suffered most, and as the colours had been an especial mark, he thanked and mentioned by name the ensigns who carried them—the Hon. Mr. Lindsey and Mr. Thistlethwaite.

ADVANCE FROM THE KATSCHIA TO BELBEK.

On the 24th of September the French and British rear-guards broke up from the encampment at Katschia, and advanced towards the village of Belbek, situate on the river of the same name. The heights of Katschia, which our energetic foe would have defended, were soon scaled by the infantry, to whom a two days' rest had been most beneficial. The artillery and train of commissariat arabas proceeded by a longer and safer road. Several troublesome ravines intersected the road, and created a little confusion amongst the wagons, in which two or three were overturned. In the present absence of means of transport, this proved to the commissariat a sensible loss. The French rear-guard was composed of light troops, Zouaves, Legion Etrangère, and Chasseurs d'Afrique. The quick and elastic step of the French soldier is admirable, bordered as he is with a heavy load, and shows what an excellent training school Africa has proved to the French army. The route presented the usual uninteresting features of the Crimea; not a tree to relieve the eye, nor a spring to afford refreshment to the wearied soldier. In the afternoon a cloud of dust in the rear announced a body of cavalry, which turned out to be the Scots Greys, who had just landed. The horses of this magnificent regiment were in splendid condition, and one could only regret the number of sabres being so limited. Towards the evening a few white houses, surrounded with vineyards and garçons, and a flowing stream, were distinguished, and proved to be the village of Belbek, where we halted for the night. The first rush, after arduous were piled, was, of course, to the water. The wise then went in search of wool to kindle the bivouac fires, the foolish dived into the interminable vineyards and gorged themselves with their luscious but dangerous fruit, whilst the French experienced an irresistible curiosity to ascertain the nature and respective value of the goods contained in the houses. The latter were most pleasantly built and most comfortable. At the top of the valley of Katschia, the house of General Alexits was a Greek church, which inside with numerous shrines, gilt work, and handsome pictures. Before the main body of troops entered the ravine the two priests in charge of the church surrendered themselves, and requested protection, not for themselves, but for the sacred object of their charge. As a matter of course, their petition was granted, the keys of the church given up to Lord Raglan, and a guard mounted round the building, which no one was allowed to approach. It was only as a great favour that I was permitted to look in at a small portal to see the beauty of the interior. The priests were also put into their own house, and a sentry left there to prevent intrusion.

There were some magnificent houses and villas, furnished in the most luxurious style, but abandoned and desolate. A description of one will suffice for nearly all. The house of General Alexits was placed in an extensive and beautiful garden, laid out with the most exquisite taste, and abounding with fruit and flowers of all descriptions. The rooms were spacious and lofty, enriched with gold mouldings, and with the floors inlaid with coloured woods. I never saw such a scene of wreck and desolation as these rooms presented. The superb carved rosewood furniture was lying about in heaps, mixed with books, vases, costly china, bronzes, pictures, and shattered mirrors. Over these the soldiers were trampling recklessly, searching for such articles as would be of use to them during the march. In another room was a handsome and well-selected library, containing about 4,000 volumes. The books, which were principally in French, English, and Italian, were scattered about in all directions, and trodden ruthlessly under foot. One small and beautifully-furnished room had evidently been used as a kind of sitting-room for young ladies. There was a large two-horned frame, with some rich embroidered work in it still undisturbed; while patterns, crochet, knitting-work, and fashion-books lay close by. There was an album on the table, also filled with water-colour drawings and sketches, and in the corner of the room a handsome piano, guitar, and volumes of music. I was quite disgusted with the way in which both English and French soldiers went ransacking everything, though it was amusing also to see the selections they made. One fellow would haul himself with a handsome table, which he certainly could not carry more than a hundred yards, while another took a glass chandelier and lustres. Zouaves walked off with gilt curtain poles, or handsomely bound volumes of music, while their comrades staggered along under the weight of large gilt arm-chairs. Lord Raglan had issued an express order that none of our soldiers were to enter the houses; but, in spite of the prohibition, stragglers searched every house they came to. One can hardly be surprised at this, especially when they only follow the example set them by their superiors. It was quite dark before all our troops had crossed the bridge at Belbek. So precipitate had been the flight of the enemy, that they had neglected to destroy anything, even the bridges. The destruction of the latter would have delayed our advance at least two days.

An avenue of poplars, flanked by vineyards and vegetable gardens, led to most of the houses, which were chiefly one story high, and well furnished. A variety of outhouses extended to the back. In the greater number of these houses the furniture and everything of the slightest value had been destroyed by their owners. Fragments of mirrors, of upholstery, and even ripped-up feather beds, strewed the waxed oak floors. In others, on the contrary, everything remained (though not long intact). One of these houses (says the special correspondent of the Morning Chronicle) I entered, and discovered a party of French comfortably installed. The furniture of this unfortunate house was even luxurious. The drawing room was adorned with a splendid pier-glass, in which a "Man-child de Logis" of the Chasseurs d'Afrique was conspicuously admiring his self, and inviting his own François, of the "Legion," to the same agreeable occupation. François, of the "Legion," was however, half asleep on a stately velvet-covered couch, little dreaming of what a slight threat hung, if not his existence, at least his equilibrium, for a tiny little Zouave was industriously occupied in cutting open the mattress of the sofa, no doubt with some very valuable aim in view. In another room was discovered a piano, which afforded intense delight to the surrounding soldiers. A jovial-looking little "enjoyal" presided at this harmonic meeting, assisted by a numerous, if not a select, circle of admirers. The president was energetically hammering away at the French air of "Din, din," tuneful in England as the Drum Polka. The numerous audience gaily accompanied the chief of a composition by a song in which the matrimonial misfortune of an certain "lieutenant" were graphically and elegantly described. An enterprising party had discovered, in the meanwhile, the road to the cellar, which proved fatal to the comfort of the little assembly installed in this comfortable mansion; for this piece of intelligence rapidly spread, and very soon reached the discriminating ears of the commanding officer, who very properly considered it an unreasonable moment to indulge in any bacchanalian excesses. The edict then went forth that the house should be immediately cleared of its visitors and devoted to the flames. Instantly groups issued from all the doors, laden with a startling variety of objects. Some had chairs in their hands, others articles of bedding, and the tiny little Zouave, who had completely succeeded in discovering no hidden treasures in the sofa, and had most effectively aroused François of the "Legion," now ran triumphantly from the portal, staggering under the immense weight of the drawing-room pier glass. Very soon a column of smoke, followed by a vivid flame, issued from the devoted house, and brilliantly illuminated the darkness of the night. The British troops, as well as the French, were soon engaged in preparing their evening meal, and gradually the din and bustle of the camp was hushed. At length nothing broke the calm stillness of the night, save the "All's well" of the sentinels, pronounced in every bough and patois of our fair and distant homes.

SKIRMISH AT KUTOR MEKENZIA.

The morning of September 26th dawned grey and cold. The men of the 4th Division were early under arms, and the march commenced. It soon became unfortunately apparent that many of our poor fellows had been seized with the ague, and with diarrhoea. As the sun became warm, these gradually lagged behind, and finally had to be laid on the wagons. They all struggled manfully, and intense weakness alone induced them to quit the ranks and fall across the road. During this day two men were buried, and the French lost three or four.

Towards mid-day, after several halts, we arrived in sight of a smoking pile, which turned out to have been a Russian barrack. Here a good rest was given to the men, who instantly dispersed in search of water, of which the poor fellows stood greatly in need. None had tasted a drop since the preceding evening. Fortunately a little well was discovered, which yielded a very small and nasty supply. Below the barrack, which had been set fire to the day before, lay a small deserted farm, from which the surrounding space had derived its name. Kutor Mekenzia, or, as we have christened it, "Mackenzie's Farm," figures on Arrowsmith's admirable map of the southern portion of the Crimea, and was on the 26th of September the scene of a very smart skirmish.

As the 8th Hussars, the 11th Lancers, and the Scots Greys, under Lord Lucan, with Captain Maude's troop of Horse Artillery escorting the commander-in-chief, Lord Raglan, were quietly proceeding through the wood of stunted oak which surrounds Kutor Mekenzia, an aide-de-camp galloped up from the front with the following astounding report:—From an opening in the wood he had described a Russian army, at least 25,000 strong, marching some ten miles a day, whilst the baggage of the rear guard was slowly proceeding at a mile's distance. Lord Raglan, whose life is too valuable to be exposed in a skirmish, joined an approaching infantry division, whilst the cavalry and artillery dashed forward at our existing pace. By Kutor Mekenzia the wood opens, and a considerable barren space extends. Along this space runs the road which connects Simferopol and Bakhch Serai with the harbour of Balaklava. Here the enemy's force, probably exaggerated in number, had marched, bound, I presume, towards Bakhch Serai, from whence it could have threatened the left flank of the allied army, had it advanced against Fort Constantine as was anticipated. On perceiving the approach of the little British force, the carts instantly started off at a rapid pace, by which many were overturned, and arrested the progress of the remainder. A battalion of infantry (800 strong) and 500 sabres protected this baggage of the Russian rear-guard. Captain Maude, with his four guns, gallantly galloped up abreast of the farm and took the road, while Captain Maude's troop, with two howitzers belonging to the same troop, advanced in front. The guns were quickly unlimbered, but here the Russian infantry formed with kneeling rank, and poured a discharge at the artillery. So inaccurate was the aim, caused evidently by trepidation, that not one of our men was hurt. The 8th Hussars were ordered to the front, and the 500 Russian cavalry wheeled and disappeared in the wood. Our guns then opened with case shot into the Russian infantry, and the latter also towards the wood. Captain Maude's troop broke and fled also towards the wood, and the wood and poured in case shot with terrible effect. The Scots Greys dashed into the thicket, carbine in hand, and picked off many of the fugitives. The 11th Lancers galloped up the road to some distance, but with no effect. Above fifty dead bodies were found on the ground, and many must have died wounded in the wood. Twelve ammunition-wagons fell into our hands, and were blown up. Many carts were captured, containing chiefly linen uniforms, but also some cases of champagne, which proved a most acceptable and unexpected prize.

Our rations are only salt beef and biscuit—such things as potatoes or vegetables of any description are of course unknown. Chatska was the first place where supplies of any kind were wanted in this respect, for the gardens were full, and it was quite ridiculous to see our men leaving on their march laden with cabbages, melons, grapes, figs, apples, onions, pears, &c., stuck on their bayonets, or hung round them on strings.

ROUTE ACROSS THE TCHERNAYA TO BALAKLAVA.

Having halted two hours at Kutor Mekenzia, the 4th Division resumed its weary march. Along the road flanked by the shady wood it was not unpleasant, but soon the trees became more scarce, and a steep ascent led to a vast dusty road below. The artillery was in the division and the arabas experienced considerable difficulty in ascending the hill, which was strewn with broken wagons. No accident happily occurred. Had the Russians cut up this steep and narrow road, dominated by a long bushy ridge, much delay would have been caused to the allied army, but the defeat of Alma has decidedly deprived the enemy of his vaunted pluck and energy. This hill once safely descended, all went on smoothly enough. We were now on the high road to Balaklava, and a most important road it is. A hole regiment might have been deployed in its immediate breadth. A hole regiment might have proved most annoying, and the carts were soon filled with men knoeked up by the fatigue of the day. After four hours' march along the road we arrived, towards dusk, at the Chernaia or Black River. On the brights beyond the stream, along which the 4th Division bivouacked, the whole French army had encamped. We here found excellent water, a great quantity of forage, which was equally acceptable, and some magnificent fruit. An immediate rush at the latter was made by men of both camps, in spite of the terrible lessons daily given to them by cholera and diarrhoea. The gardens were situated some distance to the right of the camp, and suddenly a most amusing spectacle presented itself. A cry of "Russians are coming!" was uttered by some ill-conditioned individual, whilst a complete panic spread among the British, and French and English lurking about the vineyards. Every man instantly darted off as if twenty Cossacks were at his rear, and the alarm was sounded in the French camp. Within five minutes the whole French army was under arms, ready for action, affording an admirable proof of the individual character of gallant army. The night was extremely raw and cold, and the morning of the 27th was cloudy, and towards eight o'clock a slight shower of rain fell. The midday sun soon chased away the rolling clouds, and during the remainder of the day we were favoured with that magnificent cloudless sky of the Crimea.

At half-past six the 4th Division commenced the day's march, but owing to the position of the French army had, after two minutes' progress, to halt for two hours. We halted near a bridge which spanned the Tchernaya, and which had not been destroyed by the enemy. Large parties of Zouaves were starting on foraging expeditions, and before we broke up many had already returned laden. One sturdy little fellow was struggling valiantly with two geese which he held under his arms, whilst another had slung across his back a venerable old ram, who was violently resisting his forcible abduction. Beyond the bridge was a deserted inn, turned into a French corps de garde; and not far from this building ran the aqueduct which, coming from Bartovka-pas, furnishes Sebastopol with water. This aqueduct has, I have heard since, been cut off near the town by our engineers; but that step will have no immediate influence on the town, which contains vast cisterns and wells sufficient to resist a siege of three months. The heavy guns and British bayonets will move more speedy and efficient. Prince Napoleon, with a large staff, has galloped past us. Towards nine o'clock the division resumed its march, and by three arrived in sight of Balaklava. Here the sick were taken from the arabas, and conducted to the hospitals established in that town.

PORT OF BALAKLAVA.

Balaklava is a wonderful place. Nature, in one of her freaks, has endowed it with an admirably little harbour, deep enough to contain the largest man-of-war. The entrance is very narrow, and dominated by cliffs some 500 feet high. A little channel winds to the widest part of the harbour, which is completely shut in on all sides by the hills. The town appears to have been thriving, as several houses and a church are in course of construction. A very respectable quay runs along the water side, and here the Agamemnon, the Saga, and some forty or fifty of our large transports, ships and steamers, are safely moored. The magnificent Agamemnon lies the nearest inland and 300 yards beyond her the harbour terminates in a mud-puddle. A ruined Genoese fort of large extent in olden times dominated the entrance to Balaklava, but a small earth work was the only work of defence established by the Russians. The latter have displayed a great absence of foresight in not having rendered the entrance to the harbour, so indispensable to us, more formidable. A single ship, artfully sunk, would apparently have rendered the entrance impassable.

The best houses of the place are now occupied by the allied generals, or converted into offices for the necessary departments. The adjutant-general occupies a pleasant house, shaded by poplars. In the high street are Lord Raglan's quarters, the various hospitals, and the post-office. The town at Cambridge occupies a house outside the town. The harbour is closed, but several of the inhabitants have remained behind. I remarked one old gentleman, whose constant occupation appeared to consist in walking up and down the street, and bowing most humbly to every officer or soldier who passed. The inability of manner and natural politeness of the British soldier are both well known, and the monotonous obeisances of the old gentleman were rewarded by a patronising nod, and a "Bono-fidemy."

Some of the largest houses have been turned into hospitals; but I doubt if the air of the town be healthy. Completely shut in by hills, scarcely a breath of fresh air can penetrate, and the water has a most offensive smell. Outside of the town stands a village, called Kadikoi, which possesses some large houses and a church, which might be employed without desecration in the charitable service of covering the sick.

The quay at Balaklava presents an exciting appearance. Strings of soldiers line the shore, passing the cannon-balls from hand to hand, as they are landed from the ships' barges. The heavy ship 32-pounders are being swung by cranes from the same launches, constructed at Constantinople, which landed our artillery and cavalry in Kalamita Bay. As each gun tumbles the earth, fifty blue jackets dart forward and drag it up the steep road with the only cheers peculiar to Jack. The gunpowder stores will be landed at once, and the farm-houses on the heights have already been destined as magazines.

This is a most beautiful, romantic little spot; the inhabitants, descended from Greeks, were quite unaware of our proximity, and astonished at our approach. However, they made wim resistance they could, and then surrendered; there was no one except a few prisoner soldiers (Russians) in the town on our advent. The women and children had been sent away to a hill opposite, but have returned tolerably numerous since. They have much confidence in the English, and do not seem alarmed or ill-dread in the smallest degree when walking among the soldiers.

BALAKLAVA, Oct. 2.—The day before yesterday the whole of the French and British troops left here with the English artillery, Sappers and Miners, and Light, 2nd, 3rd, and 4th Divisions for Sebastopol. Balaklava is to be the headquarters during the siege; first, because it is the most convenient place for landing stores; and next, because it commands the high road to Sebastopol, from which it is only six miles distant. The French are to occupy the hills of Kherston, which command the outworks and fortifications on the south; the English storm the outworks and detached forts which cover the town and shipping at the end of the harbour. As yet it seems that the north side is to remain untouched. Directly the 4th Division came in sight of the fortress, a tremendous fire was opened on it from shot and shell. Our men, however, were completely out of range, shot and shell. Our men, however, were completely out of range, shot and shell. Our men, however, were completely out of range, shot and shell.

ARRIVAL AT SEBASTOPOL.

Having sent on the greater number of carts, laden with sick, to Balaklava, in order to return on the morrow with provisions from the commissariat ships, the 4th Division quitted the narrow road and took to that leading to Sebastopol. At Kadikoi lay the Light Division, and we encountered on our route the three other divisions and the cavalry, bivouacking on several heights. The 1st Division and the road was a little farm-house, skirted by a beautiful little vineyard. Their overpowered with thirst. I forgot all protest, and tasted here, for the first time, the Crimea grape. Imagine to yourself, old soldier matter-of-fact people at home, clusters of luscious grapes, old soldier matter-of-fact people at home, clusters of luscious grapes, old soldier matter-of-fact people at home, clusters of luscious grapes.

By the farm-house a beehive was discovered, and after a little hesitation, one heroic individual, I regret not to have his name, dashed at it, and completely knocked it to pieces. I may mention that, like many other great men, this brave-spirited gentleman failed to reap the advantage of his energy, for the beehive bees attacked him with such fury, that, abandoning his prey, he rushed from the spot, pathetically exclaiming "Murder! Murder!" The hive was, however, soon emptied of its store by the baggage guards, who miraculously contrived to hold in each hand an immense block of honeycomb, without letting fall their trelocks, or dropping the dignity of the British soldier.

The savage bees, instead of attacking the proper criminals, very noisily darted at the inoffensive pack-horses, who certainly enjoyed a energy for which they had hitherto received no credit.

Towards dusk we approached our destination, and soon reached, and was to take up its position. Our destination was soon reached, and was to take up its position. Our destination was soon reached, and was to take up its position.

Two miles below the town, to reach which England has sent some of her best blood; but at this inspiring sight officer and soldier forgot the fatigue, sickness, and privation, which had been the common lot. Since the day we halted, the 14th of September, all, except the generals of division, have slept in the open air, and except the generals of division (and I am not even sure of some of them), not a man has had his clothes off since he set foot on the Crimea. We have only washed at the three rivers we passed, Alma, Tchatka, and Belbek; elsewhere we have not had enough water to drink, much less to wash with. Owing to the scarcity of the latter necessary, some of our horses have died; and what was as bad, where there was no water there was no wood, and of course we had to do without bivouac fires, or even fires to cook our victuals. Yet, in spite of these privations, privations which it is easy to speak of, but terrible to bear, not a man of our troops has murmured. Satisfied with their victory, and with the prospect of achieving a tremendous blow upon the enemy at Sebastopol, they bear all cheerfully, and even laugh off the dreadful sickness which infects their ranks.

SEBASTOPOL ON THE THIRD OF OCTOBER.

Burn of Joudé-atar Oct. 3.
Public expectation, proverbially impatient, and now excited by the victory of Alma, will be sadly disappointed, I fear, at the very passive nature of the intelligence from here. As yet not a gun has been fired against Sebastopol, and although the enemy has thrown a few shells at our advanced divisions, not a life has been lost. This, however, is but the calm preceding the storm. Since the hostile forces have been face to face no time has been wasted on either side. Day and night have the Russians laboured to strengthen the neglected land fortifications of the town. Fresh redoubts have been thrown up, breast-works constructed, and the stone towers most exposed to our bullets have nearly disappeared in the earth thrown up against them. The enemy deserves the greatest credit for the energy he has shown in the last few days, but it now remains to be proved if their activity be inspired by determination or despair. A spirit of dissimulation and falsehood seems to lurk in everything Russian; and in the inner harbour of Sebastopol, with her guns elevated to command the plan above, lies a 74-gun ship, painted to resemble a three-decker. This paltry artifice, however laudable in a Chinese man-of-war, is certainly unworthy of a Russian admiral. On our side, at Balaklava, the greatest activity has never ceased to reign. The stupendous task of landing the heavy siege guns has been concluded without accident. Forty-two 8-inch guns and mortars are already within a mile of the positions they will occupy. Sixteen others, with sixty 32-pounders landed from the ships, follow up to-day. This night, ground will be broken, and probably to-morrow, or the day after, our hundred and twenty guns will open their fire upon Sebastopol. Much, will, of course, depend upon the nature of the ground where the parallel lines will be drawn, and our engineers will describe the same in the most unfavourable, being rocky with little earth. Ground will be broken at 540 yards from the town. There can be little doubt that, our guns once placed in position, a breach will soon be effected, and then British bayonets will clear the Russian batteries and intrenchments, but I fear that before they can be brought efficiently to bear we shall have a heavy loss of life to deplore.

From what we hear from deserters, it seems that the whole of the aristocracy, and indeed all the Russian population of South Crimea, have sought refuge in Sebastopol. So great is the concourse of inhabitants, that thousands sleep in the streets each night. As a preliminary operation, we have turned aside the little stream of water which supplied the town, so that the garrison must soon begin to suffer. I expect that as the siege is pressed, the great mass of the inhabitants will be removed by the north side, and most likely with their escape we shall not interfere, as we have no idea of starving out the fortress, but storming them.

In Sebastopol all shops are shut, the opera and theatre closed, the inhabitants living on what provisions they had previously stored, none permitted to leave; so, should the resistance be protracted, you can figure to yourself what will take place from a victorious, and excited, and angry soldiery.

ESCAPE OF MENSCHIKOFF!

From some deserters who have come over to us, and from some prisoners who have been taken, it appears that Prince Menschikoff succeeded in effecting his escape from Sebastopol with 21,000 men, so that our forced march to intercept him was, after all, ineffectual, except in so far as it cut off most of his baggage, and £100,000. He has left a garrison of 30,000 picked troops in Sebastopol, with instructions to Rodaskoff and Gortschakoff to defend it to the last stone, as he will be able to come to its relief. A courier was sent on the 15th to Odessa-Sacken, at Odessa, with orders to spare nothing, but move 30,000 into the Crimea at all risks and with all speed. But armies are not moved with a word; and, supposing the message to have reached by this date, it will be at least five weeks before the Odessa contingent can arrive, and even then, must make such forced marches as will not leave them above 15,000 effective men. Yet, though no one has much fear of Osten-Sacken, the escape of Menschikoff gives some uneasiness. There are, doubtless, garrisons dispersed about the Crimea, which, if collected, would reinforce the 21,000 under his command to an army of 40,000 or even 50,000 men. The arrival of such a force might compel us to raise the siege of Sebastopol for a week while we advanced and fought Menschikoff, and then Heaven knows how the season might be for recommencing our work.

In Sebastopol they are evidently determined to fight hard. All the sailors have left the ships of war to man the walls, and most of the heavy guns have been taken to assist in the defence of the outworks. All stores of every kind not absolutely necessary to the besieged are being burnt.

VOLUNTEERS TO STORM THE BREACH.

General Sir John Burgoyne is actively engaged planning the approaching bombardment, and the army have full confidence in his genius and experience. That Sebastopol will fall before six days have passed is certain. The ship guns will be worked by sailors; and about 100 blue jackets, landed from the Agamemnon and Sanspareil, encamped on the 2nd inst. on shore. Jack anticipates with great glee his participation in the honours of the day. Above a thousand marines—and magnificent fellows they are—have volunteered to storm the breach, and they were landed and bivouacked near Balaklava. Carts and arabas, charged with ammunition, shell-cases, and enormous round shot, slowly transport their murderous loads to the rendezvous or depot of the heavy guns.

(Owing to the fire opened by a Russian battery, rapidly erected for the especial purpose, the British Second and Fourth Divisions retired a few hundred yards to the rear of the position they occupied. Not a shell told, but it was properly deemed inadvisable to risk the men's lives with no advantage to gain. This battery might easily have been silenced, had three or four of our siege guns been brought to bear upon it, but not a shot will be fired until all the cannon are in position. The practice of the Russians was not bad, and most of the shells burst in a small quarry about fifty yards in front of the 4th Division. The range was about 1,800 yards. A few round shot passed over the division, and one fell in the midst of the 16th Regiment, but no one was hurt. The men looked upon the whole firing as a spectacle got up for their especial amusement, and expressed their approbation or disapproval, according to the merits of the case. If a shell burst within twenty yards of the group, it was hailed with a universal "Bono Johnny;" but if, on the contrary, the projectile chanced to burst in the air (as often occurred), the men appeared even disappointed.)

Yesterday, Oct. 3rd, the 4th Division changed places with the 3rd, who took the van, the regiments composing it being all armed with the Minié rifle, whilst the 4th still shouldered the old musket. It is expected that the hammer of the assault will fall to the 4th Division, supported by the 3rd. The other divisions, who have already plucked their laurels, and right gallantly, too, at Alma, will act as reserve. Our divisions now occupy the following positions:—Nearly turning the town is the Light Division; to the left are the 3rd and 2nd Divisions; slightly to the rear of the 3rd is posted the 4th Division.

The 1st Division lies at Balaklava, between which place and the remainder of our force are picketed the cavalry. The strength of the latter arm has been materially increased by the arrival of the 4th, 5th, and 14th Dragoon regiments from Varina. The passage was, unfortunately, very severe, and the horses have suffered a great deal, and look very wretched. The men appear in good condition. The 4th regiment, landed from the Simla, alone lost fourteen horses.

The French are still engaged in landing their guns, a work which seems to proceed rather slowly. Their ships are anchored in a bay slightly to the north of Balaklava, near Khersonese point. It was originally intended for our gallant ally to occupy the extreme right of the position, but this plan has since been altered, and the French guns will open to the left of the British. The Turkish division will, I imagine, form the centre. A Mr. Upton, son, I believe, of Colonel Upton, the constructor of the Sebastopol inner harbour, was taken prisoner a day or two ago by our men. He occupied an extensive farm near the town, and imagined himself at liberty to remain there. Mr. Upton declined at first giving any information about Sebastopol, stating himself to be a naturalised Russian subject; but he was given to understand that, according to English law, once an Englishman always an Englishman. Nothing of importance could, however, be gained from him.

Official intelligence has been received at the War-office, of the deaths of the following officers in the Crimea, in addition to those who fell in the battle of the Alma:—

Lieutenant-Colonel William Francis Hony, of the 20th Regiment.

Captain John A. Freeman, of the Scots Greys; Captain Longmore, of the 8th Hussars; Captain the Hon. C. L. Harc, of the 7th Fusiliers.

Lieutenant and Adjutant Thomas Irwin, of the 13th Light Dragoons; Lieutenant Rumsay Wardlaw, of the 19th Foot.

Ensign Wm. Fred. Phipps, of the 19th Foot; Ensign Wm. Y. Johnston, of the 30th Foot.

Quartermaster John Leahy, of the 4th Foot.

water before the action had quite commenced. The ball fractured his leg, and he subsequently sank under amputation.

THE LAST CHARGE.—The Guards and Highlanders dashed into the redoubt. Sir Colin Campbell was at the head of the latter, far ahead of his men, shouting "We'll hae none but Highland bonnets here;" but the Guards pressed on abreast, and claimed with the 33rd Regiment the honour of capturing a cannon—an honourable rivalry, and flattering to both corps. The Russians who resisted were killed or scattered, and, throwing away their knapsacks and muskets, even their boots, the remnant dispersed over the country. Thus was won the battle of Alma. At the commencement of the action many ladies were on the heights. Prince Menschikoff had given them to understand that on the part of the Russians it would be a mere review—that the allies would not be able to meet his heavy artillery, and would retreat. In the carriage of Prince Menschikoff, which was abandoned, a sum of 50,000*fr.* was found.

LETTERS FROM THE ARMY IN THE CRIMEA
THE FUSILIER GUARDS.

The following letter is from the Hon. Hugh Annesley, of the Fusilier Guards, whose brother, Lieutenant Annesley, of the 11th Hussars, died of cholera in the Black Sea. It is addressed to his mother, the Countess Annesley:—

"I . . . We forced the passage of the Alma yesterday, and defeated the Russians most gloriously, though with great loss to ourselves, owing to their extraordinary strong position. Oh! officers say it was as strong as Torres Vedras. The Russian army was drawn up on the heights, upwards of 40,000 strong, and with immensely heavy artillery, 24 and 33 pounders. The Light Division advanced to the attack, supported by the First Division (Guards and Highlanders). They got across the river, and then advanced against the intrenchments. The 23rd was in column when the brigade of Guards charged in line. My company (the fourth) was next to the colours, and in the very centre of the line. We got up to within fifty yards of the ditch when the regiment before us (which has had the three senior officers killed) turned right about and came down in our face, thus breaking our line. We were about thirty paces then from the ditch, and the fire was so hot that you could hardly conceive it possible for anything the size of a rabbit not to be killed. I kept on shouting 'Forward Guards!' to the few men that were not swept away by the * *, when a ball came and stopped my mouth most unceremoniously. It entered the left cheek and came out at the mouth, taking away the front teeth. I instantly turned to the rear, feeling it was about 100 to 1 against my ever getting there, as the bullets were whizzing round me like hail. I tripped, and thought it was all over with me; however, I got up again with the loss of my sword and bearskin, and at last got into the river, and out of fire. I had then another struggle on the other side, where grape and round shot were ploughing up the ground and shells bursting; however, I stumbled on, and at last got out of fire, and sat down among wounded and dying soldiers and horses. The doctors gave me some water, and then were obliged to go to others; so when they left I sat there for above half an hour before I could find out where our hospital was. At last an officer of the 10th, though wounded himself, gave me his arm, and took me to the Fusilier hospital, where I got some water, and sat down to bathe my face.

"There were three or seven of our fellows there—one with fire balls in him, another three, and a third with his leg broken. My servant got me some blankets, and then we got a stable, half burnt down, cleaned out, and five of us lay there for the night, very wretched, as you may suppose—operations going on all around us. Some weak brandy-and-water and some tea were all we had. The smell we were in was a horrid thing; the heat, and dust, and flies intolerable. So in the morning four of us came down to the fleet, and I, with two others, am on board her Majesty's ship London. W. S. has been most kind and attentive. I shall never forget his kindness. I had a hot bath and some arrowroot. I was nearly famished, having had nothing to eat since four o'clock a.m. the day before. The doctor says the swelling will soon go down; it is rather painful, of course, at present.

"B—— is all right; the cavalry, being so few, were not made use of. They showed themselves at the end of the action, and more than double the number of Russian cavalry ran away from them like sheep. Poor B—— came to see me in the hotel we were lying in, and burst into tears when he recognised me; I was so altered. Of course, one cannot have an ounce of lead through one without swelling, and my face is like a good-sized turnip; my mouth much larger than I have any desire to see it in future. I do not suppose the ball could have hit me in any other part of the head where it would not have been attended with more danger—a most summary dentist the ball was, to take out all my teeth at one smash, except four grinders; there was a decayed one, which I hope has gone with its brethren, but I can't make out yet if it has or not. There is a good bit of tongue gone also, but the doctors say that will not signify, and that I shall speak as plain as ever, or at most only with a beeping lisp; so altogether I think even you must allow that I have every reason to be thankful, and I hope you will not allow yourself to fret the least about me.

"Just as we were charging the great redoubt, I prayed, 'O God, spare me!' and I really no more expected to return alive than if I had been tied to the cannon's mouth. Only Captain grape and caisson being fired at us within thirty yards, besides a whole imitation letting drive as hard as they could into us. Both the other officers in my company were wounded. The colonel (Berkeley) had his leg broken. All the sergeants were wounded and two killed; and, I believe, at least twenty or thirty of our men.

"I was close to Lindsay when the Queen's colour was smashed in his hand; there were twenty bullet-holes in it, yet he was not touched! Our loss has not been exactly ascertained, but I should say it is above 1,000 killed and wounded; and that of the French, I believe, is greater. Lord Raglan said it was one of the most glorious things the British army had ever done,

"The doctor cannot say how long I shall be unfit for duty, but I shall try for leave to go to England soon. The Fusilier Guards have fourteen officers wounded; two or three, I fear, will not recover. The 5th company, which was next mine, has every officer wounded. In fact, we were just opposite the centre of the redoubt, and exposed to the hottest fire of the whole day. Sir G. Brown says he never saw so hot a fire; and he was all through the Peninsula, and at Waterloo. Strange Jocelyn was the only officer commanding a company who was not struck by a ball. Seymour was not wounded, but hit in the watch, which saved his life. The Russian soldiers are satirges; fancy their firing at our poor men when they were lying wounded on the ground—they even tried to stab some of them with their bayonets! One of our doctors was actually binding up a Russian's wounds when the man turned round and fired at him! Their loss, I have no doubt, was greater than ours. The allied Horse Artillery played on their dense masses running away, and every ball must have killed hundreds. The French were on our side, close to the sea. They had not so hot a fire as we had from the redoubts.

"Two Russian generals are prisoners. They said their lines were thought to be so strong that they could have kept us in check for three weeks! . . . Tell B—— I shall, perhaps, have some shooting with him this winter, after all. I shall, at least, try to get home. . . ."

The following is a letter addressed by Brigadier-General Torrens to Mr. Delmé Radcliffe, of the Priory, near Hertford:—

¹⁰ Field of Battle on the River Abasco, Coimbra, September 21

"MY DEAR DELME, — I shall wring your heart, indeed, and poor Mrs. Radcliffe's, by the sad intelligence I have, alas! to communicate. Your poor dear boy fell yesterday at the head of the company which he commanded (No. 1), while gallantly leading them to the attack of a Russian entrenched battery, heavily armed and most strongly occupied. Never was a more noble feat of arms done than the capture of this battery, and in that capture the poor dear old Welsh were foremost. Their loss has been frightful. Chester, Wynn, Evans, Conolly, my poor sister's boy, Harry Austruther, Butler, Radcliffe, Young, were all killed dead at the same moment, and within a space of 100 square yards. Applethwaite (It is feared mortally), Campbell, Sayet, Bathurst, Stoughton, wounded. Only six officers remain untouched and nearly 200 men are hors de combat. The exploit was noble indeed; but what a sacrifice! The position of the Russians on this river was most formidable; it was defended by 40,000 men, and was carried in two hours and a half. They lost great numbers, the conduct of our army, on whom the brunt of the fight fell, was equal to anything that it has ever done. The French behaved admirably. I am heart-sick at the loss of so many dear and valued friends, and at the thought of my poor sister's anguish. God alone can comfort us in these overwhelming calamities, and to His Almighty will let us humbly bow. Your dear boy died instantly without pain, and lies buried in a deep grave along with his brave comrades, close to the spot where he so nobly died. God bless you, Delmé. May He comfort and support you both in the prayer of your old friend and comrade.

"ARTHUR W. TIGRESS,

"P.S.—Harry Torrens and Bulwer buried him. His wound was in the centre of his breast. A bayonet lay on his back, and his body had been untouched and respected. God bless and save him. His face was calm, with almost a smile on it. ————— "A. W. T."

We extract from the Holker Guardian the following interesting letter, which was received on Wednesday by the wife of a colour-sergeant in the 33rd Regiment, now residing at Queenshead, near Halifax:—

"DEARLY BELOVED WIFE AND CHILDREN,—It is with joy that I take up my pen to write a few lines to you, hoping they will find you in good health, as they leave me, your two brothers, and Mason. Thanks be unto the Lord for His mercies; although I and Mason were both wounded in the late battle. I am wounded through the small of the arm, just below the shoulder joint, clear of the bone—shot with a musket ball. Mason is shot through the thick of the thigh, not touching the bone. I, Mason, Sergeant Spence, William Stone, and Mr. Greenwood were all with the colours, and we were all wounded. After landing in Russia we laid seven days without our tents. On the 19th we commenced marching on Sebastopol. After marching eight miles we saw the enemy on the hills in front of us. We crossed a river which took us up to the knees in fording. We advanced, and the Russians retired to another hill. As soon as we had got to the hill they had left, they commenced firing cannon on us, and our artillery commenced firing at them; it lasted for an hour. We had one artilleryman wounded and the Russians thirteen killed; no more fighting that day. On the 20th under arms, an hour before daylight, all formed for action. We marched about eight miles, until we came to a village named Alma (Barlik); then we formed into four lines—Light Division in front, 1st next, 2nd next, and 3rd next—seven regiments in each line. We then advanced, until our line was within gunshot of the village. The Russians then set fire to it, and retired along a bridge over the river. Then they commenced to cannonade us, and all our infantry laid down on their bellies. Our artillery then advanced, and commenced firing on them. We laid in this position for an hour. I must here thank God again for His mercy to me, a nicked slinger, for the cannon balls were buzzing over our heads and rolling through our ranks, and many of our comrades were launched into eternity. At last we were ordered to advance. I had to step out to the front, Mason on my right, and Sergeant Spence on my left, six paces in front of the lines, directing the advance, when the bullets went whistling past us as thick as hail. At last we came to the river, which we had to ford, and in doing so took us up to the middle in water. After we got through the river we were out of the fire of the Russians; and it caused the 1st, 23rd, 33rd, 77th, 88th, and 11th Regiments to be a little out of order, all being eager to get at the Russians. We never halted to form line properly, but up the embankment we went in great disorder, when a regular volley of musketry and grape commenced to be poured into us; and then we commenced firing too, and a regular engagement took place which lasted for an hour, the Light Division being all the time engaged the others looking on. After being engaged half an hour, Mason was shot through the thigh. One ball hit the poah of his cap, and slightly grazed his forehead; another ball went through the leg of his trousers, and another cut the string of his water-burrl; so he had many a narrow escape. He was carried to the rear on a stretcher by Sandy and Dr. Marlow. Many of the wounded laid in the night on the field, nobody apparently caring for them. I was wounded about two minutes after Mason. I went to the rear, out of shot, and remained there till the fighting was over, which lasted three hours and half. Then I went and joined my regiment, and went among the sick the following morning. It is supposed that the Russians had 500 killed, and double that number wounded; our side, perhaps, 50 killed, and 700 wounded. John Barrett, of Mountain, is slightly wounded under the chin. He is with me. John Spencer, of Swanwick, is killed. The Russians are a fine body of men. We took one brace of cannon from them. They retreated in the greatest confusion, throwing away all they had—arms, accoutrements, knapsacks, &c. We followed them about two miles. It was a sad sight. Pray for my dear wife and children, and all who have any regard for me, and I will pray for you all. God bless you. Kisses for the children.

THE TROOPS IN THE CRIMEA.

SIR.—Observations in the papers that philanthropic exertions are being made by the public in order to alleviate the sufferings of our brave army in the Crimea, as well as to remedy the lamentable want of medical aid both in that country and in the hospitals at Constantinople and Scutari, has led me to suggest that a good supply of quinine be not forgotten, and I may be permitted to add, that, during a residence of several years at Sebastopol, Kupaatoria, Hakshisraï, &c., where that valuable medicine was not to be obtained, I cured many thousand cases of the Crimean fever with the remedy used by the Tartars, and which could easily be forwarded from this country—namely, the dearsu colomus, or sweet-scented dag, which, with equal portions of powder of gentian root and black pepper, forms an excellent substitute for Peruvian bark; moreover, the cost would be a mere trifle.

As I am writing a medical topography of the Crimea, I may state that the neighbourhood of the river which runs to Sebastopol is dangerous in the extreme, especially near the Ministry of St. George, at which place the late Emperor Alexander caught the fever, and died from it at Tanguart, where I, at that period, was acting as quarantine and town surgeon. I may also remark, that the coast from Per-kup to Empaloria is particularly healthy in comparison with the southern and south-eastern parts, and consequently the most favourable places for the establishment of hospitals; but the exhalations from the Sivash are as deleterious as the malaria of the Pontine marshes, and ought to be avoided.

When the cholera was raging in the southern part of Russia (and for the treatment of which I received the thanks of the Government, through Sir James Wyllie, but no further remuneration), I found the exhibition of linseed oil, mustard oil, and rape oil the best remedies; castor oil—which I have tried in this country with equally beneficial effects—not being there procurable.

I will not intrude further on your valuable columns than to remark that we seem to forget the probability of the plague breaking out at Constantinople, where its germs are never totally extinguished, and I generally commit the most dreadful ravages on the arrival of caravans from Egypt and Syria. I never treated this disease myself, although I saw several cases at Smyrna during the period that I was resident surgeon at the British Hospital; but I ascertained from other medical men that friction with olive oil in many cases was serviceable, and it was adopted as a preventive or antidote.

To conclude, I beg to volunteer my services, whether for the Crimea or Turkey (as I speak fluently the Turkish, Tartar, or Russian languages), together with those of one of my sons, a student at the Royal Free Hospital, as to whose competency I can appeal to the professors of that institution,—the probability being that the number of young surgeons about to proceed thither, or at any rate the nurses, may be glad of an interpreter. I may add that the said young men should not be discouraged by not previously receiving "regular appointments," as I myself volunteered in 1803 in Walcheren, and served two years in the Peninsular war ere I passed my examination at the Royal College of Surgeons.

I AM, SIR, YOUR Obedient servant.

J. W. GRAVES,
Late Physician to the Governor-General in Poland.

RUSSIAN GRATITUDE

Sir,—Seeing, in a communication from your correspondent, that an officer had been "seriously injured" by a wounded Russian while in the act of giving him drink, I take the liberty to enclose an extract from a letter received from an officer in the 36th Regiment, from which I fear the injury has been fatal to my poor brother; but cling to the hope that your correspondent may be correct, and that one, at least, of my poor brothers may be safe.

You are at liberty to make use of the extract if you choose, but please not to make use of his or my name.

I have the honour to be very obediently yours,
 SNOLLETT W. EDDINGTON.
 North-park, Carnubellton, Argyll, Oct. 16.

"As the 93th Regiment was advancing a wounded Russian was calling piteously for water, when poor Captain Eddington, whose heart was as kind and charitable as it was stout and brave, ran up to him, and stooping, gave him to drink from a small flask of brandy and water, which he carried in case he should himself be wounded. This revived the wounded man, and poor Eddington ran forward to join his company, when the wretch who had just been restored by his charity fired at and shot him, his best friend. This so saddened his poor brother, Lieutenant Eddington, who was in the same regiment, and close to him, that he, in performing desperate deeds of daring, also fell, dearly selling his life in avenging the death of his gallant brother. The two poor fellows were most affectionate brothers; they fell together, and two better soldiers or braver hearts never wore the cloth."

DEATH OF CAPTAIN HARE.

SIR.—I enclose a copy of a letter which I received from Captain Watson, of the 7th Royal Fusiliers, informing me of the death of my brother, Captain the Hon. Charles L. Hare, of that regiment, whose name was returned as wounded only. Perhaps you will deem this letter of sufficient interest for publication.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
Kingston House, Prince's Gate, Oct. 18.
RICHARD HARE.
"My dear Hare,—Amid the joy and triumph of victory, amid the pain and agony of my own wound, I wept like a child when I was told of the death of one so worthily beloved by every Fusilier. Your dear good brother has fallen a victim to his high and soldierly courage. "He was severely wounded just as we were on the point of entering the battery, which, as you will see in the papers, caused such havoc among our poor fellows. Shot through the ear, he was picked up, and next day embarked on board the Andes, together with myself and other fellow-sufferers."

"He died next morning. I can add nothing to this sad tale; my own state forbids it: and all I could say would be but to tell you of my own sorrow and sympathy for the loss you and your family have incurred. Believe me yours, very truly,
"General Hospital, Scutari, Sept. 25." "C. E. WATSON."

THE WOUNDED AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 10, Downing-street, Oct. 17.
MADAM,—I am desired by the Duke of Newcastle to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of yesterday's date, and to thank you for the zeal and anxiety for the welfare of the public service evinced by your offer of linen and money for the use of the wounded soldiers in the East. I am, however, desired to state that the stores of medicines and medical comforts, as well as beds, linen, lint, and bandages, which are now in Turkey, and of which fresh supplies are constantly being sent out, are more than ample to supply the wants of the sick and wounded.

It appears to the Duke of Newcastle that the duty of having the hospitals thoroughly well provided with things so indispensable as those mentioned is one of the most imperative which can devolve upon the Government of this country, and it is one, also, which the Government has followed out and continues to perform perseveringly. It would be difficult, if not impossible, to undertake the distribution of private subscriptions with satisfaction to the donors. The Duke of Newcastle cannot pretend to answer your inquiry in what way the benevolence of persons who have subscribed sums of money for the relief of the wounded would be best applied, if not now required for that purpose; but it appears to his grace that there is at present no way in which more good can be done than by contributing to the fund for the relief of the widows and orphans of the gallant men in her Majesty's land and sea forces who have perished during the war. Should such a course be adopted, the amount may be forwarded to the secretaries of the "Patriotic Fund," or to the local committees of such fund wherever they exist, and also to any London banker, all of whom have accounts open for the purpose.—I am, madam, your obedient servant, (Signed) HENRY ROBERTS.

To Mrs. —, near Oxford.

THE GREAT DESIDERATA at this moment are more medical men and nurses. My opinion is that our Government is bound to strain every nerve at once to remedy this deficiency, and also, by electric telegraph, to place at the disposal of Lord Stratford ample means to purchase, for the use of the hospitals, everything that Constantinople is able to supply that can assuage the sufferings of the invalid and advance the progress of the convalescent. Of this, however, I feel confident, that the electric telegraph should be put in requisition, and, if it be judged expedient, to employ the subscriptions for immediate use. Thus, the amount should be telegraphed to Messrs. Coutts's agent at Constantinople, and with it a request to our ambassador there, who, I observe, has made a close personal inspection of the hospitals, that he would be good enough to superintend the disposal of the money.—ROBERT GROSVENOR.

READING REMARKS in the Times of the 12th instant on the additional suffering endured by the wounded in the Crimea, owing to the want of linen and lint for bandages, it has occurred to me most forcibly that some help might be afforded if private individuals were to contribute such stores of old linen as most households can easily supply, and which are very often wasted by careless and ignorant servants. Of course, every one might choose the way they thought safest and best for sending these stores to the army. I myself merely mention that I intend to send nine through the Admiralty-office at one of the principal ports, if they are willing to undertake the charge of what is collected in this neighbourhood.—C. F.

THE MEN IN THE EMPLOY OF MESSRS. MAUTSLAY, SONS, AND FIELD, the eminent engineers of Lambeth, commenced on Saturday, October the 14th, a voluntary subscription in aid of the fund for the relief of the wives, widows, and orphans, of our brave soldiers in the East—the same to continue for twelve weeks, with a promise of further aid if required; Mr. Sherriff, the foreman of the firm, having kindly accepted the office of treasurer.

NURSES FOR SCUTARI HOSPITAL.—We are authorised to state that Mrs. Nightingale, who has been for some time acting as superintendent of the Ladies' Hospital, at No. 1, Upper Harley-street, has undertaken to organise a staff of female nurses, who will at once proceed with her to Scutari at the cost of the Government, there to act under her directions in the English Military Hospital, subject, of course, to the authority of the chief medical officer of the establishment. Mrs. Nightingale will herself select the persons who will accompany her, and will recommend them to the War-office for certificates, without which certificates, of course, no one will be admitted to the hospitals. After her departure, arrangements will be made for the granting of certificates upon the recommendation of persons to whom Mrs. Nightingale will have delegated the duty, to such additional number as may, from time to time, be forwarded to Scutari upon her requisition. By this arrangement it is hoped that much confusion and disappointment may be prevented, it being obviously impossible in any hospital, but especially in a military hospital, to admit as nurses any persons offering themselves, without any proof or evidence of their possessing the knowledge, experience, and general capacity requisite for duties so difficult and so responsible, and the willingness to submit implicitly to the regulations of one central authority.

MEDICAL SUPPLIES FOR THE ARMY OF THE EAST.

Army Medical Department, 13, St. James's-place, October 16th.

Dr. Smith, Director-General of the Army and Ordnance Medical Department, presents his compliments to the editor, and as much misapprehension seems to exist as to the sufficiency of medical attendants, and of medical stores and supplies with the army and in the hospitals in the East, and as great anxiety has thereby been caused to the relatives of the sick and wounded, he sends the accompanying papers, showing the number of medical officers, and the quantity of medicine and hospital stores, which have been forwarded from this country at different times since the 24th February last.

In a memorandum, respecting medical supplies to the army in the East, the Director-General also states that:—

"The number of medical officers with the British forces in the East, at the time of the battle of the Alma, was 276—being 1 to every 97 of strength. In the Peninsula the number of medical officers was 1 to every 154 of strength."

"At the present moment there are thirty more medical officers on their way to Constantinople, and fifteen more are waiting embarkation. Dr. Smith is happy in being able to state confidently that the medical officers at Scutari (he believes twenty-one in number) have at their command everything necessary to the treatment of the wounded soldier; hence there is no necessity whatever for any effort being made by the public to send out to Constantinople, lint, old linen, &c."

DEPARTMENTAL MEMORANDUM.

The following list of medicines, surgical instruments, surgical materials, medical comforts, hospital stores, and means for the conveyance of sick and wounded, is furnished to enable the medical officers of the army in Turkey—

1. To ascertain the provision which has been made to meet the wants of the sick and wounded, and the material which is with the army available for that purpose.

2. To report to me, through the inspector general of hospitals, what other articles, if any, may be advantageously added to the supplies which have been forwarded.

Special attention is requested to the carts and waggons which have been furnished for the conveyance of sick and wounded. No doubt, many defects will be discovered in both, therefore the medical officers serving with the army will, in all probability, have an opportunity of improving upon appliances that are known theoretically only to the British army, though practically to the French since 1792, when a supply of light waggons, accompanied by a corps of disciplined attendants, were sent into the field on the recommendation of the late renowned Baron Larrey. But notwithstanding the French have used so long what we are now only beginning to employ, still there is reason to believe much must yet be effected before we shall be able to consider the object in view to have been satisfactorily attained.

Medical officers will, therefore, be pleased to report, through the inspector-general of hospitals, whatever defects they may discover in the vehicles which have now been supplied; and also suggest whatever alterations, additions, &c., they may think calculated to render them more suitable and efficient.

ANDREW SMITH, M.D., Director-General,
Army and Ordnance Medical Department.

13, St. James's-place, June 20, 1854.

Personnel—(Staff).

1 inspector-general of hospitals; 4 deputy inspectors-general of hospitals; 12 staff-surgeons of the 1st class; 13 staff-surgeons of the 2nd class; 48 staff assistant-surgeons; 1 chief apothecary; 3 dispensers of medicines; 2 purveyors; 6 purveyors' clerks; 2 medical clerks; 1 eutler and his assistant.

Personnel—(Regimental).

1 surgeon and 3 assistant-surgeons to each regiment of infantry (850 men); 1 surgeon and 1 assistant-surgeon to every two squadrons of cavalry (250 men); 1 assistant-surgeon to every troop of horse artillery; 1 assistant-surgeon to every field battery, and 1 surgeon ordnance medical department for general duties: total number of medical officers, 205.

[Here follows a list of material, medicines, instruments, apparatus, comforts, books, stores, &c., which would fill three columns of THE FIELD.]

Means for the Conveyance of Wounded from the Field.

780 bearers, or stretchers; 20 spring carts, on two wheels, built according to the directions of Mr. Guthrie; 20 spring waggons, on four wheels; 9 Flanders waggons.

In addition to the before-mentioned supply, each corps is provided with a regimental, and with a detachment, medicine chest, each chest amply furnished with medicines and surgical materials, according to the regulations of the service, also with a box of apparatus for fractures and dislocations.

The surgeon of the corps has a full set of capital instruments; the senior assistant a portable set; the surgeon and three assistants each a case of pocket instruments, and a case of lancets; there are likewise, for general use, a set of cupping instruments and a stomach pump.

The slightly wounded are accommodated towards the front of the carriage, placed back to back, separated from each other by wooden partitions, and prevented from falling outwards by each compartment being provided with a chain, covered with leather, to be passed across the chest, when the seat is occupied, with a view as well to safety as support. The badly wounded, extended on elastic stretchers, 6 feet 6 inches long and 2 feet wide, are placed behind, and, as already stated, in separate compartments, into or out of which the stretchers glide with facility, from their being provided with rollers. Each of the compartments is fitted with a ventilator from end to end, which can be closed or opened by the person lying on the stretcher.

A waterproof roof, supported on wood hoops, covers the body of the carriage, and under it is a depository for firelocks, knapsacks, caps, accoutrements, &c. There is also, under the seats for the slightly wounded men, a large, capacious locker, in which may be placed water-sacks—for barrels soon become useless, especially if exposed to weather and sun—bedding, and other articles, which the medical officers of the army may consider as likely to be useful; and under the hinder part of the wagon is a convenient box, in which medicines, instruments, &c., can be carried if required.

At the back part of each vehicle there are two iron brackets, which fold down to support a stretcher, and so afford the means of forming a convenient table. This plan I from the first preferred, to one which was strongly urged on me, namely, to form a table by placing a stretcher across two panniers.

Each of the men employed in removing the wounded from the field is to carry one haversack-like bag filled with water.

Each wagon is capable of carrying from the field, or from field hospitals to hospitals in the rear, ten persons, namely, four badly, and six slightly wounded men, each in a separate compartment. By this arrangement every individual will be ensured against inconvenience or injury from his immediate neighbours, which would, did no partitions exist, certainly prove most detrimental, especially to weakly and severely wounded men who might have to be transported along an irregular broken or sloping road, or over country where no roads exist.

The Flanders waggons are intended for the carriage of bedding, stores, &c., to be used in field hospitals; and in the event of their not proving sufficient for the purpose, the waggons intended for the transport of the sick and wounded are capable of being quickly dismantled internally, and made available to supply the deficiency. They, like the others, are placed on springs, and in case of necessity can also be used for the carriage of sick and wounded.

OUR FRENCH ALLIES.

The Moniteur says:—"We mentioned a short time ago that the French Government was taking measures to centralise at Constantinople the reserves of the different administrative branches of the expeditionary army. The hospital service, which takes precedence of all others in time of war, was fully adequate to the number of wounded and sick after the battle of the Alma and the march on Balaklava."

We give the following highly interesting details from a letter dated Constantinople, September 30:—

"The exact number of sick and wounded who arrived here on the 24th, 26th, and 26th September:—

"FRENCH HOSPITALS."
Wounded, French.....	1,350
Wounded, Russians.....	20
Sick.....	350
	1,920
"ENGLISH HOSPITALS."
Wounded, English.....	2,000
Wounded, Russians.....	120

"Our hospitals were prepared for the reception of this great number, 1,920, of sick and wounded. Their removal was effected without the slightest accident, and in perfect order, on stretchers, carts, or carriages, according to the nature of the wounds. All the patients found on their arrival their beds ready, with the medical and surgical service completely organised. The large and magnificent hospital of Pera received at the same time 609 wounded French and 220 Russians. Among our own wounded we have 31 officers—one general officer, M. Leblanc, who suffered amputation of the left thigh; Lieutenant-Colonel Mernet, wounded in the leg; and M. Condé, whose right arm was amputated; the remainder were captains, lieutenants, and ensigns. The Turkish War Minister and several pashas have been to visit the hospital. They can scarcely understand how such efficient arrangements could have been organised in so short a time; and they praise highly our generosity, which prompts us to treat our prisoners like our own soldiers. This act of humanity will not be thrown away. The wounded Russians were at first greatly afraid of falling into our hands, but at present they are full of admiration and gratitude at being so well treated. They were perfectly amazed when our hospital orderlies placed them in good beds, and changed their filthy clothing for clean linen. With respect to our soldiers, they exchanged with their enemies of the day before as many 'bonos' as with the Arabs or Kabyles of Algeria. I saw a Zouave, with a fracture of the foot, fill and light the pipe of a Russian whose arm was in a sling. The hospitals of Constantinople are capable of containing at this moment about 4,000 men, and it is expected that in a very short time there will be accommodation for 10,000. They are to be furnished with iron bedsteads as soon as possible."—[General Thomas has reached France.—Ed.]

MISCELLANEOUS ANECDOTES, INCIDENTS AND MEMORANDA.

THE MOST FORMIDABLE POST AT ALMA was that which the Guards and Highlanders advanced to attack. It was an entrenched earthwork, mounting seven long brass 32 and 24-pounders, and occupied by about 2,000 infantry; while a force of nearly 5,000, on the rising ground behind, protected it still more. Before rushing to the attack the whole division lay down in one of the Russian trenches to load and close up. While here the Hon. Major Macdonald, the Duke of Cambridge's aide-de-camp, with the greatest courage and coolness, scrambled out of the trench on horseback to reconnoitre the enemy's position. The instant he showed himself a shower of balls and musket bullets were directed against him. One of the former struck his charger full in the chest, and hurled both horse and rider to the ground. Fortunately Major Macdonald was only slightly hurt by the fall, and some officers who saw the occurrence rushed to his assistance, and extricated him from his mangled steed. The line of Guards, which was directly facing the guns, seemed to stagger and reel under the fearful volley. There was an instant's pause, while the Duke rushed to the front and gave the command to fire. The three battalions raised their firelocks and discharged them with one stunning report, and then lowering to the charge, with one wild cheer, dashed over the works, and were in the battery. Sir George Brown had his horse killed under him; so also had Sir Colin Campbell, who was thanked on the field by Lord Raglan. The Duke had a narrow escape, a cannon-ball passing within a few inches of his head. The 3rd French division has had 380 men killed or wounded. General Thomas was amongst these latter. Near him Prince Napoleon, for whom the battle of the Alma was a most brilliant début in actual fighting, incurred at one moment great danger of being killed, or at least badly wounded. Whilst the sharpshooters of his division were endeavouring to dislodge the Russian infantry, a cannon-ball was seen bounding along, and was about to fall exactly on the group amongst which the Prince was standing. General Thomas, who had seen it fall and perceived its direction, cried out, "Take care, Monseigneur!" The Prince gave his horse the spur, and succeeded in turning him aside in time to allow the ball to pass, which broke the leg of Military Sub-Intendant Leblanc, who was standing close behind the spot from which the Prince had removed. M. Leblanc was so badly wounded as to be obliged to suffer amputation.

GRAPE AND GRAPES.—The Rifles, under Major Norcott, waded through the river Alma in a masterly manner, followed by the Connaught Rangers and the other gallant regiments forming the Light Division. The river once crossed, the men dashed into some vineyards which flanked the high road; but these having been cut down, afforded no shelter. The fire here was fearful, for now the British were within grape range. The men here gave one of those surprising examples of coolness and contempt of danger which forms one of our national characteristics. In the midst of the most tremendous fire which an army has ever encountered, with comrades falling around them, the men commenced seeking for and plucking the half-ripe grapes, which were hanging temptingly on the hewn vines. The vineyards were passed, and the Light Division, forming in line, advanced in measured pace up the hills. The hail of grape shot and of musketry momentarily checked its progress; but now our soldiers opened their deadly volleys into the redoubt. Hundreds fell here on either side, but the skill of our Rifles and the excellent training of our men told fearfully in the enemy's ranks. One of our Riflemen knocked over successively thirty-two Russians. After a fearful struggle of one hour the Light Division pressed up the principal hill, with tremendous cheers, on the redoubt and entered it. An officer of the 33rd, I regret not to possess it, inscribed his name on a 32-pounder which had caused fearful ravages in the British ranks. The Light Division followed up the bill, pouring in volley after volley after the retreating Russians.

THE ZOUAVES.—After a cup of coffee which they snatched time to prepare, the Zouaves, with the foreign legion and some other light regiments, traversed at half-past one p.m. the village of Alma-tamak, and scaled the heights looking down upon the sea, on which were posted the Russian left wing. A tremendous musketry fire at a very short range soon opened upon the advancing French from and around an octagonal tower. The Zouaves for a moment were beaten back, but a sergeant-major of the name of Fleury dashed ahead, with the tricolour flag in his hand right to the base of the tower. A bullet laid him low; but the Zouaves, followed by the other chivalrous regiments, charged the Russians with the bayonet, and utterly routed them. The Zouaves and others were soon busy engraving their names and regiments with their knives on this tower.

BRITISH "PLUCK."—When the Fourth Division first heard the roar of cannon it was at some twelve miles distance from the scene of action. Double quick march was instantly commanded, and when at length it became necessary to take a moment's repose, the sick and exhausted were ordered to step out of the ranks. Although the whole division might have been comprised under the latter category, but one man presented himself, and a drop of brandy having refreshed him, he retook his place. When, at length, the division arrived on the field the action was over, but that by no means detracts from the meed of praise it has earned.

WHEN THE LIGHT DIVISION was compelled to retire in order to reform their ranks, out of which they had lost 1,001 men and officers, the major, one ensign, and eight or ten men of the 95th remained with the colours upon the ground. The major joined his small force to the ranks of the Guards, and, obtaining permission, charged up to the redoubt with them, and then proceeded to join his division, the second. Some of the escapes appear extraordinary. Many of the officers and men had the ornaments of their caps and uniforms shot away, and many had slight grazes along the temples and head; some eight or ten shots were found flattened on the little breast-plates fixed on the cross-belts, others embedded in the bullion of the epaulettes. Colonel Blake, of the 33rd, had one shot through his cap, one lodged in his saddle, one in his holster, two in his horse, and one which glanced along the wrist, ripping up the skin to the elbow.

A mor is attributed to Lord Raglan at Alma. When the armies were drawn up, the French officer who was in attendance on his lordship for the purpose of communicating with the marshal (and who was taken by the Russians) made some observation upon the appearance of the French wing, to the right of the English. "Yes," said Lord Raglan, glancing at his empty sleeve, "France owed me an arm—and she has paid me."

WE HAVE RECEIVED an account of the capture of a Mr. Upton, an Englishman, resident in the Crimea. This gentleman is a son of an engineer employed on the works of Sebastopol, and resides in a comfortable country house in the suburbs of the town. Lord Raglan rode up to the house, ignorant of its occupant, and was much surprised at the appearance of one of his own countrymen. It was thought that much might be learned from so intelligent and trustworthy a prisoner; he was accordingly carried off to the camp, where he will be treated with kindness in return for as much information as he can be induced to communicate.

LORD CHEWTON, who was reported as dead, is at Constantinople, and in a fair way of recovery. The officers there are getting on very well, and the air of the Bosphorus is more favourable in cases of fever than that of either Varna or the Crimea. The French wounded, to the number of 1,500, and the wounded Russians, to the number of 350, are placed in the hospitals of the Grand Champs, of Canidji, of Dolma Bashi, and Rami Tchilik, all in the environs of Constantinople. The French are well supplied with surgeons, and with all the necessities of a hospital; they have employed many medical men of the country, and a large number of dressers. The want of dressers is still felt at Scutari, and it is to be hoped the English authorities will adopt the same means.

THE COLOURS OF THE 7TH REGIMENT were, for a short time, left upon the field under the batteries. This was by no means the fault of the gallant 7th. Literally there was no one to bring them off. Every one who advanced for the purpose fell either dead or mortally wounded beside them. The 7th, having lost half its strength from the fire of the battery on its flank, was compelled to fall back to reform. There for a time the colours remained upon the field until the arrival of the Guards made a diversion, when Captain Pearson, Sir George Brown's aide-de-camp, rode in and took the standard from the hands of a sergeant who was mortally wounded. No enemy's hand had touched them, though they had a very narrow escape.

"THE 7TH FUSILIERS," says one correspondent, "lost their colours, and the Russians got hold of them too; but the 97th charged them, and charged them three times before they succeeded in getting them back. The 7th Fusiliers were cut up tremendously by the Russian batteries. They fired nothing but shell. It was a strong and tremendous fight, all the French, English, and Russian artillery firing shell at once, close to one another, and the line and cavalry charging all at one time. It began at one o'clock, and all was over at four, so I will leave you to form some idea what it was. We took a Russian general prisoner. He said they did not think the English were coming against them at first, but, when they knew it, they said they must do their best. They had orders to fire into the English ranks as much as their position would allow. We have some more Russian prisoners. They are to go to Constantinople with the sick and wounded. All the women are gone home; there was a large steamer full of them."

SECOND EDITION. LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

RETURN OF THE BALTIC FLEET.

A telegraphic despatch informs us that Vice-Admiral Sir Charles Napier, with his fleet, remained at Nargen, Oct. 10.

The squadron of Rear-Admiral Plumridge sailed from Kiel on the 16th of October for England.

SORTIE FROM SEBASTOPOL.

PARIS, Saturday Morning.

The Moniteur of yesterday confirms the intelligence of a sortie attempted by the garrison of Sebastopol. It says, the Chargé d'Affaires of France at Constantinople, writing on the 10th, informs the Minister of Foreign Affairs, that the captains of the steam transports just arrived from the Crimea state that the besieged had attempted a sortie against our siege works, and that they had been vigorously repulsed.

The Porte has sent a reinforcement of 4,000 men to the Ottoman corps which forms part of the expedition.

(By Submarine and European Telegraph.)

The Journal de St. Petersburg of the 14th contains a telegraphic despatch from Vienna of the 4th inst., stating that the commissioners of the Western Powers and of Austria and Turkey had met at Constantinople to arrange the question of the protectorate on the basis of the proposal made by the Austrian Cabinet. [Is "Secret Diplomacy" again at work?]

Two despatches from Marseilles announce that on the 7th the siege batteries at Sebastopol were finished, covered with intrenchments against attacks from without, and that the bombardment was to begin on the 10th or 11th.

The engineers thought that the place might be taken about the 18th, and that forty-eight hours would suffice to make a breach.

There was a report of a sortie by the garrison, which had been vigorously repulsed.

It is also said that the Government have received a despatch from General Cuvrobert, in which he says that the allies occupy an impregnable position, defended by 80,000 men and 200 guns, and that they could repel the attack of 200,000 Russians.

The Grand Dukes Nicholas and Michael have joined the Southern Army.

The French army will take the left of the attacks, from the sea to the southern fort; the English army will have the right, from the southern fort to the ruins of Inkermann.

The French army is divided into two bodies: the first corps, under General Forez, and composed of the 3rd and 4th divisions, will undertake the siege; the second, under the command of general Bosquet, and comprising the 1st and 2nd divisions, will form the corps of observation. The Turkish division is in reserve, in order to act according to circumstances.

The English army has made analogous dispositions: one part of its divisions will conduct the attacks against the place; the other part, forming a corps of observation, will join General Bosquet's corps.

Balaklava was perfectly fortified.

The Porte sends 10,000 men there, the half of which embarked on the 9th.

ODESSA, Oct. 8.

Prince Gortschakoff is here.

Prince Menschikoff, who could not maintain his position at Bakshiserai, has sent his army to Sebastopol, and gone himself to Perekop.

THE CZAR TO GORTSCHAKOFF.

ST. PETERSBURG, Sept. 29 (Oct. 11.)

His Majesty the Emperor has deigned to address, under date of Sept. 26 (Oct. 8), the following letter to the General A.D.C. and Artillery-General Prince Gortschakoff, commanding the troops of the 3rd, 4th, and 5th corps of infantry.

"Prince Michael Dmitrievitch, by a ukase addressed to the Directing Senate, and by an order of the day to the army, we have named you commander-in-chief of our army of the south, and we have conferred on you all the privileges of the commander-in-chiefs in time of war, by virtue of the regulation of Dec. 5 (17), 1846. At the same time we have submitted to your jurisdiction, with the rights of commander-in-chief: 1st. The governments of the Podolia, Kieff, Poltava, Kharkoff, Catherinoslaw, together with the city and suburbs of Taganrog, Kherson, the northern part of the government of Taurida, as far as the isthmus of Perekop, and the province of Bessarabia; 2dly. All the troops stationed in these governments and this province, excepting the reserve and the depot of cavalry and horse artillery, cantoned in the districts of the military colonies, which will remain under the immediate orders of the inspector of the cavalry of reserve. We are assured that you will fully justify the confidence we repose in you.

We remain for ever your well-affected "NICHOLAS."

SPIES AT VARNA.

The Presse states that, as a consequence of the correspondence which fell into the hands of the allies at the battle of the Alma, some very important arrests have taken place at Varna.

MARSEILLES, Friday.

The Pharamond arrived yesterday with General Thomas on board, convalescent. She brings advices from Constantinople of the 10th, and Balaklava 8th October. The following orders had been issued:—

Orders to the Army before commencing Siege Operations.

The trenches will be opened this evening against Sebastopol: a working party, consisting of —, furnished by the —, will be marched to the engineers' depot at — p.m., where they will receive tools and directions from the engineers' officers and sappers, who will guide them to the works; they will be without arms and accoutrements. The guard for the protection of the working and ground will consist of —, furnished by —, and will parade in the camp at — p.m., be conducted to their positions, posted, and receive instructions from staff officers who will be assembled for the purpose.

All the movements of the parties must be, if possible, kept out of view of the place.

After moving from their last place of assembly, which will be after dark, the utmost silence must be preserved, and the least possible noise of any kind made. The working parties will be arranged in proper order by the engineers, but will not commence work till ordered, after which it must be carried on with the greatest secrecy.

The engineers will be charged with the arrangements, but the officers of the troops must be responsible for the maintenance of order and attention to the directions given by the engineers, and for the amount of work done; on diligence and regular conduct of the working parties will depend more rapid and complete success of the enterprise. The working parties must not quit the works on slight alarms. If the enemy make a sortie, the guard will advance and drive them in, and before they reach the work, if possible; should the working party be absolutely obliged to retire, they will take their tools with them, and re-form a short distance in rear to return to the work when the sortie is repulsed.

The guard will be posted in rear of the working party, and near to it, if possible, under cover from the fire of the place; if not, they must lie down in order of battle, with accoutrements on, and each man with his firelock by him—one party not less than one third of the forces absolutely on the alert all through the night, taking it alternately ready for an immediate rush on the enemy.

A sortie is out and on the works in a very short time, and therefore the guard must be in immediate readiness to attack it without hesitation; nothing is so easily defeated as a sortie if charged without delay.

After the repulse of any sortie, the guard will return under cover as soon as possible, and resume their position.

All working parties and guards will be composed of entire regiments, or parts, and not of detachments made up of different corps.

THE SIEGE OF SEBASTOPOL.

(By Electric Telegraph from Marseilles.)

MARSEILLES, Saturday.

The City of London transport ship, which left Constantinople on the 13th, arrived on Friday evening.

She brings despatches from Lord Raglan, which reached Constantinople after the departure of the Pharamond with the mail of the 10th inst. from that port. The despatches are dated "Balaklava, Oct. 9."

The works of the siege continued to advance.

The allies were doing well.

The attack on Sebastopol was to commence on the 10th or 11th.

On the 7th the allies seized two guns.

Two Greek vessels, laden with corn and linseed, had been captured by the Anglo-French cruisers.

(By Submarine and European Telegraph.)

VIENNA, Friday, Oct. 20.

A private despatch from Bucharest, dated the 16th inst., announces that the bombardment commenced on the 13th. Two hundred pieces of heavy artillery were employed.

Sebastopol was not expected to hold out more than three or four days.

Thirty thousand Russians have crossed the Danube into the Dobruja. The vanguard is at Babadagh. Twelve thousand Russians, under Ushakoff, occupy the Danube ferries near Toultscha.

NURSES FOR THE EAST.

With reference to the announcement which has been made of the Government proposal for sending out nurses to the sick and wounded in our camps and hospitals in the East, we are enabled to state that arrangements are now complete for dispatching a staff of twenty-four of them, this day, under the able and intelligent superintendence of Miss Nightingale. This body will include a certain number of Sisters of Charity, belonging to the Roman Catholic Church, who have placed themselves entirely at Miss Nightingale's command, and who, in accompanying her, have disclaimed all intentions of a proselytising character. Dr. Smith, of the Army Medical Department, has received instructions to co-operate with Miss Nightingale in her plans and preparations; and, in order to open the way for this noble mission, the chaplains in the East have been apprised of the steps which have been taken, and strongly urged to assist the work and its ministers with their sympathy and regard.—The Press.

We are happy to be enabled to announce that, under a special arrangement with the Peninsular and Oriental Company, a number of surgeons, and the staff of nurses organised by Miss Nightingale, will embark at Marseilles on the 27th inst., on board the Vectis, and be conveyed by that vessel to Constantinople immediately after the delivery of the outward India mail at Malta. On ordinary occasions the Vectis and Violetta wait at Malta while the steamer from Southampton is engaged in transporting the India mails and passengers from that place to Alexandria and back; but, as the distances between Malta and Constantinople and Malta and Alexandria are nearly the same, it is expected that the Vectis will reach Malta on her return from this special service in time to prevent any delay of the inward India mail, while, by this arrangement, the staff of surgeons and nurses will, in all probability, reach the scene of their labours on the 4th proximo, some days earlier than the passage could have been accomplished by any other available means.—Times.

The great barnack at Scutari has been turned into an hospital for the British wounded and sick. About a quarter of a mile separates it from the hospital of Scutari, which is likewise full of our sick and wounded countrymen. The Turkish authorities have shown every willingness to provide suitable buildings for the disabled soldiers of Great Britain and France; and now a large three-decker has been towed out from the arsenal, and anchored off Scraglio Point, where it will be used as the hospital ship for the British. The French wounded are at the new large building near the Grand Champ at Pera, and in the great barracks of Doud Pasha and Rami Tchilik, outside the gate Top Kapau, over at Constantinople.—Morning Chronicle.

DUBLIN, Oct. 20.

A considerable number of troops are now assembling at Cork for embarkation in the large iron screw-steamer Jura, which leaves Liverpool to-morrow, and may be expected at Queenstown on Sunday. She has on board upwards of 500 tons of ordnance stores and other supplies, and will convey 1,200 troops to Constantinople. The following drafts are to arrive in Cork, by this day and to-morrow, from the provisional battalions, to join their regiments serving in the Crimea, viz.:—30th Regiment, 1 officer, two sergeants, 100 rank and file; 33rd Regiment, 1 officer, 2 sergeants, 100 rank and file; 49th Regiment, 3 officers, 3 sergeants, 130 rank and file; 50th Regiment, 3 officers, 2 sergeants, 100 rank and file; 68th Regiment, 2 officers, 1 sergeant, 70 rank and file. And the following drafts were to arrive on Friday from the provisional battalions at Birr and Templemore—viz.:—41st Regiment, 6 officers, 2 sergeants, 100 rank and file; 47th Regiment, 1 officer, 2 sergeants, 100 rank and file; 55th Regiment, 2 officers, 3 sergeants, 160 rank and file; 57th Regiment, 25 rank and file; 63rd Regiment, 70 rank and file—the two latter from Birr. Transports for the above drafts are expected in Cork harbour immediately for their conveyance to the Crimea.

RACING.

"On the green, green turf."

MR. EDITOR.—The Houghton meeting commences on Monday, and promises to carry the sport merrily on throughout the entire week. Something like sixty races are set down for decision, but the Cambridgeshire monopolises the whole of the betting, though even for that, not more than half a dozen horses are in anything like demand. As the great majority of the items are named for on the spot, my task of making a summary of the likely issues will necessarily be brief.

The Criterion is the chief event of Monday. It has but rarely proved, as its name would imply, the test for the coming Derby. There are thirty-three nominations, among which some of the best horses have incurred various penalties, but, at the same time, the list embraces one or two dark mammals of note and promise. Bonnie Morn has 9lb, Fayaway, Sarabaud, Rifleman, and Polydora colt 6lb, Para and the Refraction colts have 3lb extra. Strood and Cruiser, both of whose names are to be found in the Derby books, have nothing beyond the original 8st 7lb to carry. The extra weight has occasionally been borne in triumphantly; and, should such be the case on the present occasion, I fancy that it will be accomplished by Rifleman or Para. They may possibly bring out Strood, and his chance would then be preferred by me before that of Cruiser.

The Match for 500 sovs. between Lord Caledon's colt, by Simoon, out of the Queen, and Lord Waterford's colt, by Seaborse, out of Red Rose, cannot be run, since both of these high-bred animals are reported to have "gone to the dogs." The justice of grim death is not often so even-handed—the necessity of forfeit on either side being at once obviated. In the Match, Dervish, 8st 9lb, against the Physalis colt, 7st 7lb, 300 sovs. h ft, T.M.M., I must be held enough, notwithstanding Lord Glasgow's long run of ill fortune, to go for the latter, as I apprehend that Dervish will be found unable to give away so much weight, even to the very moderate son of Pantolon, over a long distance. By the way, I find among the nominations for The Filly Sapling Stakes,

TURF TALK.

"The chosen sport of a great and a free people,"
OUR SAILOR KING.

THE SPORTING WALLET.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

The Houghton meeting, the last of the Newmarket series, commenced on Monday, and, considering the many drawbacks to the success of turf gatherings this season, was as interesting and "taking" as any of its predecessors. We never recollect having witnessed so much health in better condition; and the weather, as of our writing, has been exceedingly propitious. Hundreds of visitors, who have had the good fortune to participate in the excellent sport which has transpired, and, where we have given the various returns of the day from the tests; but the interest attached to the results demands position comments from us. We shall not, however, interfere with the result, but leave it to the reader; our remarks will be confined to the main features only of the meeting.

The principal event on the programme was, of course, the Criterion Stakes tourney, which brought its average field of eight to the post, one half of the starters being penalised.

Bonnie Morn shirked the 9lb penalty, and Strood also proved an absentee; but their non-appearance was somewhat compensated for by the debut of the Daubury Derby crack, The Cruiser, who has, of late, been strongly supported for his Epsom engagement. He is one of the last of the Venison race we have left, and is a nice colt, albeit a little loosish in the loins, but requires age to develop himself and to "take" generally. He was short of work, and, although Alfred Day was up, consequently found but few supporters. The field, too, being otherwise weak, 6 to 4 was laid on Rifleman, and he was the only animal really backed; but, to the surprise of the multitude and the inexpressible joy of the fielders, the overlooked Para and The Cruiser defeated him easily, the filly, carrying 3lbs extra for her Bedford Stakes win, beating the "maiden" colt, after a beautiful conflict from the Duke's stand, by a neck, the victory being a rather clever one. This failure of the Squire's colt, after the slovenly manner in which he got through his northern duties, cannot by any means prepossess the public in his favour for the Surrey tussle; and we certainly think that Saraband, who was behind him to-day, and is as compact an animal as any man need wish to look at, will give him his quietus when they meet again. The Cruiser obtained exactly the same place as did West Australian in 1852, each making his debut; and the question arises, is there another Stockwell, Daniel O'Rourke, or West Australian, among the vanquished team? We doubt it. The race has invariably given the fielders a lift. The Nigger upset the Pitsford "pot" in '49; and, in the succeeding year, Ariosto succumbed to Mountain Deer and The Confessor—the latter not even mentioned prior to the start. Daniel O'Rourke and Red Hind were each in favour on the next occasion, but the colt had the call; nevertheless, he and Stockwell were nowhere, the filly winning easily, despite her 6lb extra, two outsiders—Ambrose and Knight of the Shire—being her immediate attendants. In 1852, odds were hazarded on Sittingbourne, and 5 to 2 taken about West Australian; however, Speed the Plough, not backed for a shilling, brought Flatman home in triumph, a second time in succession. Nat, too, was the pilot of the Nigger, and, independent of his two winning mounts for this stake, since then he has twice been third. Last year Moresca and Alombic were in force, but Phaeton and Rosaline easily vanquished them, neither of the latter twain being fancied prior to the fall of the flag. The stake has not found that support in late seasons it was wont to do, as the following figures testify:—

THE RIVAL PETS.—DRAWN BY T. H. WILSON.

Winner.	Subs.	Run.	Value
1849—The Nigger	37	9	£500
1849—Mountain Deer	38	12	850
1851—Red Pearl	40	6	710
1852—Speed the Plough	29	7	610
1851—Phaeton	32	8	650
1854—Para	33	8	710

Dervish, the riderless crack of Melton, could not give his 16lb to the offshoot of Pantaloon and Physalis, which not only was a "fillip" to the Earl of Glasgow, and "nuts to crack" for the fielders, but afforded another proof, if wanting, of the Derby mistake, and the general inability of the Cowl's to "stay." On the health, the Cambridgeshire Stakes, "foreigners," Scherz and Hervine—the colt from Germany and the mare from France—were in great demand; but Catspaw's defeat did not improve Orinoco's position, whilst Ganelaf's success, howling over a bevy of thirteen on the Cambridgeshire course at the close of the afternoon, brought him into the market for the morrow's handicap at 25 to 1. During the day fifty-seven horses ran, and the nine stakes were worth £1,300 clear; not only the strongest string of animals known on the opening day for many years back, but the largest amount of money paid over to the Monday's winners since the 1849 meeting, when it reached £1,430.

In the evening, Hervine, who had been third favourite on the health, was sent to the right about, and Helena also; and both Orinoco, who had arrived but a few hours previous, and Scherz were on the decline. Later, there was a reaction, and the twin once more grew into favour again; how or why they got into bad odour was mysterious, as both animals were looking well, and had done all that they had been "asked" to do. Quince and Speed-the-Plough, too, were like ducks in a horse pond, alternately up and down. Rattle, on the contrary, was as firm as a rock, and when it became known that Flatman was to pilot him, the "clinch" was given to the confidence of his numerous partisans. The only other incidents connected with the evening's speculation was the advance of Lord of the Isles for the Derby, and at one time he was quite as good a favourite as Greenish Enriens. Cruiser receded to 25 to 1, and upwards of £2,000 would have been laid out against him at that price.

The interest of Tuesday's proceedings was centred in the Cambridgeshire Stakes' issue, on the straight mile and 240 yards burst, with a stiff hill to finish up. The unexpected and comparatively small field of nineteen only was mustered. Hervine and Helena were absentees—Rattle came to a shorter price—and the Nancy fever again broke out, being backed for a deal of money at 16 to 1. At halfpast three, down went Mr. Hibbard's official wand, Scherz, as he did in the Cesarewitch, coming away with the lead, but the squabron getting well under weigh. He maintained his lead to the end, and, though challenged at the Duke's Stand by Rattle, and hard pressed by him from there, won by a head, the two finishing by themselves. Speed-the-Plough and D.O., against each of whom, 30 to 1 might have been obtained, finished third and fourth, nearly half-a-dozen lengths from the first couplet. Orinoco found the distance too far for him. As in Truth's year, the winner was objected to on the score of age, but the Messrs. Barrow ultimately confirmed the judge's award. Scherz, though of English blood, is a German-bred horse, being by the Provoost out of Freude, the latter own sister to Moresca, and foaled in 1839. This is the fourth year in succession the three-year-olds have won this stake. They have won nine times out of the sixteen, and the four-year-olds half-a-dozen times, an aged animal winning the other. Scherz, too, has carried the highest winning weight since Alana achieved the honours with 5st 9lb, in 1845; and he ran at the same weight in the Cesarewitch. It is very singular how closely woven the latter event and the Cambridgeshire have been of late years; and this year there is no exception. Rattle, like The Nabob last year, ran second for both; and D.O., third in the Cesarewitch, was fourth in this. The clear value of the stake was but £1,445—£720 less than it was last year. In 1849 it was worth £1,770, and thirty ran; 1850, £1,510, and twenty-three runners; 1851, £1,630, thirty-three starters; 1852, £1,895, thirty-one runners; and last year, £2,165, and thirty-nine starters. The settling for the present race will be a very easy one. The number of runners to-day were seventy, and the nine stakes amount to £1,905, clear.

It is much to be desired that our provincial race-committees will act up to the praiseworthy recommendation of the Jockey Club stewards, respecting claiming horses in Selling Stakes. A proper adherence to this rule would have the salutary effect of putting a stop to a most diabolical system that is carried on, week after week, by certain owners and trainers; and the non-enforcement of the rule certainly brands officials with the unenviable stain of countenancing a direct robbery of the public. The Jockey Club, and the Hon. Admiral Rous, would do well to abstain from adjudicating in matters arising out of meetings at which ALL their rules are not strictly enforced; and our patricians studiously to avoid becoming stewards in like cases. It is true that some meetings would temporarily suffer by a too rigid adherence to the Newmarket rules; owners, however, would not only soon be tired of "withholding," but would, ultimately, be cleansed of their present disgusting impurities.

Mr. Morris is rumoured to have given a very stiff price for the hire of Mr. Disney's yearling colt, Artillery, until he has run out his engagements to the end of the 1856 campaign. He is entered for the Derby and Leger of that year, and is the half-brother to Indian Warrior, on the dam's side, the sire being the renowned Touchstone, whose stock have won three Derbies, one Oaks, and three Legers within the last ten years. We hope the investment may turn out a more lucrative one than has the Indian Warrior purchase, for Mr. Morris deserves success; but we must confess to a very little faith in quadrupal affinities. The modern instances of The Crucifix, Beeswing, Martha Lynn, Barbelle, Alice Hawthorn, and Phryne descents, are too strong for the Pocabouth exception.

A splendid three days is entered by Mr. Frai for the approaching Shrewsbury meeting, and the entries are to be made on Tuesday next; on which day, also, many important stakes close at Goodwood, Newmarket, Northampton, and Salisbury. There are upwards of one hundred subscribers to the Goodwood Stakes already.

More than 100 horses have arrived since Friday last, and there is every prospect of an excellent meeting. The trains to-day have brought in a considerable accession of visitors, and the town is likely to be quite full.

Hay and corn considerations were chiefly productive of sport this afternoon, most of the winners being liable to be sold, according to the terms respectively specified. The weather was clear, sunny, and bracing until just before the race for The Criterion, when the sky became thickly overcast, the wind blew keenly, and a smart shower fell until the race was over.

The above details will show that Hifeman missed the mark, and was beaten two lengths from The Cruiser, who ran the winner in a neck. Recent rains have brought the running ground into first-rate condition.

THE SUBSCRIPTION ROOM AT NIGHT.

Speculation on the Cambridgeshire fluctuated in so extraordinary a manner that we cannot vouch for the accuracy of the following statement, made up from our list of quotations at the close. We have, however, no doubt that it will be found sufficiently near the truth.

Only the leading favourite, Rattle, held a firm position—7 to 2 of, fered, 4 to 1 taken. Orinoco oscillated between 5 and 7, and Hervine, who was third favourite in the afternoon, was driven from 12 to 1 to 20 to 1. Scherz, at one time, receded to 20 to 1, but returned to 100 to 6; he had, nevertheless, numerous opponents. Quince and Speed the Plough were alternately up at 25 to 1 each, and down to 33 to 1 each. Offers of 100 to 1 extinguished all hopes of Helena, and Stoucheage was coupled with Hervine in a bet of 50 to 1.

Whilst these operations were going on, Little Harry was introduced by a powerful party, who began by taking 40 to 1 to some money, and their example had quickly the effect of advancing him to 15 to 1—the highest offer at the close was only 12 to 1. Prime Minister, Vindex, and Little David were backed for some small sums at 25 to 1 each, and 12 to 1 was taken about John Osborne's "lot."

THE FIELD.

—A gentleman well known in a celebrated sporting circle, more for good humour than straight riding, arrived home a short time since, in a plight which would lead to the conclusion that he had had something better than a "good" time. "What sport?" asked a friend. "Capital!" replied our friend emphatically. "Never had a better run in the whole course of my life! We threw into the first ditch, and it took me three hours to catch my horse!"

O., Speed the Plough, and Prime Minister, 40 to 1 agst The Deformed, 50 to 1 agst Gamble. After several "disappointments," which were caused by St. Clare, a good start was effected, and the race may be thus briefly described:—Scherz made all the running, followed by Rattle and Quince. The Assayer lying on their right, Little Harry on the lower side; in pretty nearly the same order they arrived half-way between the Duke's Stand and the chair; Scherz and Rattle then singled themselves out; the latter made a very resolute effort, but was at last beaten by a head; an interval of five lengths separated the second from the third; D. O. was fourth; Little Harry fifth; Orinoco about seventh; the others passed the chair at straggling intervals; Little David and Octavia bringing up the extreme rear. On returning to scale, Mr. Dennett objected to the winner on account of age.

The attendance on the Bench, and the interest that was manifested, showed that the "Cambridgeshire Day" had lost nothing of its attractive character. The sport was ample and varied, and the weather was all that could have been desired for the gratification of the mere pleasure-seeker, and for the business operations of the professional speculator.

The Cambridgeshire was won cleverly by Scherz—a horse bred in Germany, and until he ran for the Cesarewitch, only known in England by the reports which had occasionally been heard of his continental achievements. He was ridden by Birbeck, a jockey who accompanied him from Germany; and, on returning to scale, his success was greeted with long and hearty cheers.

Speculation, before its close, was marked by only one new incident—but it was one that was as extraordinary as unexpected.

The Nancy-levy again broke out, and she was supported with so much spirit and confidence, that, from the extreme outside division, she was advanced to a prominent position amongst the favourites. Rattle kept firm to the last. The result was little favourable to the ring, Scherz having been heavily backed.

After the race, Mr. Dennett, the owner of Rattle, objected to the winner on the ground of age. The Messrs. Barrow were, therefore, called in to examine the horse's mouth, and they certified that he is a three-yr-old, and, consequently, properly described.

WRIGHT'S BOOK OF STEEPLECHASING.—W. A. Wright, Fulwood's Rents, Holborn.—This useful manual makes its appearance at the right time. The "cross country" work has now commenced, and all who take interest in the sport will find some valuable information in this clever compilation. It gives a return of all the Steeplechases and Hurdle Races that have been run in Great Britain and Ireland during the season 1853-4, with the names and weights of the riders. Most of the races are accompanied by an accurate description of the contests, and there is a separate index to the horses in England and Ireland. The whole arrangement of the little book is highly creditable to the publisher.

STABLE-MANAGEMENT.—THE HUNTER.

Turn me now to the hunter, and see how far he demands our consideration before and after his run with the hounds. It will be unnecessary to dwell upon the course of training proper to be carried out, as we are not writing for the stud-groom, but mainly for those whose hunters will be most effectively trained by their performance of general work during the time they are not required for the field. Assuming, then, the animal to be in a condition to go, let us at the outset oppose our protest to the absurd system of giving no food or water after six in the morning until the horse is returned to his stable at night; we should not mention such a thing did we not know it to be commonly done; and how an animal can be sustained during severe exertion under such circumstances it is difficult to see, particularly an animal like the horse, which naturally, from the conformation of his digestive system, is always feeding or sleeping. Remembering the time at which weets take place now, there can be no objection to the usual feed and water the first thing, and another feed and a smaller portion of water prior to starting, especially if the meet should be a few miles distant.

The sport being ended, the next course will depend on the condition of the animal. If the run has been moderate, the horse not exhausted, but still fresh and light in his rider's hand, his stable not many miles distant, let him be ridden steadily home at once, not walked all the way; because, after the excitement has passed off, the longer he has to bear his master's weight on his back the more he will suffer for it afterwards. The system of stopping on the road for an hour, to give the horse a pail of gruel—which, by-the-by, should generally be read, to give the rider a chop and a glass of sherry—is a bad one, if it can possibly be avoided; the stables are nearly certain to be bad, the accommodation altogether very rough; the horse, being merely a chance customer, is not much cared for, and probably gets cold and stiff before he starts again. Should, however, the distance from home be considerable, a little refreshment for man and beast may be necessary before the distance be completed; but as soon as the horse has taken his gruel, or water and a mash, or whatever can be obtained for him, by all means keep him moving. Arrived at his stable he may be treated very much as the hack after a long journey; carefully dressed, well littered down, a bran mash with oats in it placed in his manger; and the next day be again, in most cases, ready for quiet exercise with the saddle on.

We have taken for granted that our hunter has been ridden by a man who knows his capabilities, has remembered that he does not keep a large stud, and has gone accordingly, giving his horse no more than a good day's work. But we must indulge a moment in a glance at the exclusive hunter, the animal that is cultivated for the special purpose, and whose owner would as soon think of using him in any other capacity as he would of losing him altogether. We must see him arch his proud neck as his rider takes him in his hand, and steadies him at the first "rasper" to the music of the ringing "Tally-ho!" We must follow him through "a good thing," over a stiff country, five-and-forty minutes without a check—alias "a clipper." We will see him quietly taken back to his stable by the servant in attendance, and next superintend the arrangements for preventing the probably serious consequences of his severe exertion. If our establishment is properly supplied with all the requisites, washing all over with warm water is without question very excellent treatment; but unless quite convenient, and plenty of help at hand to dry the skin afterwards, it is much better left alone, and the ordinary grooming performed as rapidly as possible; a mash placed in the manger, after a pail of gruel or tepid water has been taken, the stable darkened, and the animal left to himself; no oats or beans should be dreamt of now, the stomach will shortly feel the effects of the general exhaustion, and be ill-adapted to digest such food. The following morning may find the horse dull and stiff, but not so as to prevent half-an-hour's walking exercise being taken with advantage; let him have a feed or two of oats during the day, and by degrees return to his full feeding and exercise, a week sufficing to restore him to his former condition.

It may, however, happen that the exhaustion shall be extreme, the horse incapable of moving, and shrieking with fear from the touch of a finger; in such a case, we have found a newly-stripped sheep-skin placed over the loins for twelve hours a most valuable remedy, assisted by the homing-down of good gruel, mixed with occasional doses of old ale. As the patient will not eat for a few days, by no means think of bleeding (many a fine animal has taken leave of society from such mistaken treatment); and should any more serious symptoms arise, send for proper assistance at once, remembering the old adage about "a stitch in time."

"MY FIRST MEET."

[The following, which we extract from an Irish paper, may not be uninteresting to a large number of our readers just at present]:—

"Mr. Seymour Allen's hounds will meet at Milton Bridge on Tuesday, and at Lawreney on Friday, each day at half-past ten o'clock." This paragraph headed the sporting column of the Pembrokehire Herald, the first week in October, '47. Many an anxious wish I indulged in anticipation of the first meet of the Cressell hounds, justly termed the Melton of South Wales. As I fancied, my preparation deserved some reward in the shape of sport, "I shall have at least one day in the week," was my oft-repeated soliloquy. My vocation placed me within a mile of the Cressell kennel.

My mare's appearance and breeding gave me some hopes that a little schooling and cultivation would make her a hunter. She was five years old, 15½ hands high, more than half-bred, strong, compact, and symmetrical, and every care was taken of her condition. But here her pretensions to a sporting character ceases, as no inducement, however plausible or severe, could ever make her fence. A bank three feet high she would throw herself over, if persevered with, without ever making the slightest effort to light on her feet; a drain, or any slight obstruction in the way of a leap quite unmanned her; at the sight of it, all courage, nerve, and spirits deserted her. As a last resource, I tried high condition, and the force of example and company. In anticipation of the "first meet," I had her very fresh, and her spirit as high as could be, hoping that in the rush and example of the other horses, some emulation might possess her. But I shall not anticipate. The hounds, in going to cover, had to pass my domicile. I walked after them to the place of meet, a short mile; the time was up, and no halt was made. We arrived at Maystounoor cover, a splendid square of some fifteen or twenty acres, the gorse in some parts growing to an enormous height, and impenetrable to all but a thoroughbred foxhound. As I walked into the cover, I took my stand at the top, the hounds beating on the one side in a direct line down. While this was being done I ran my eye over the equestrians assembled, and counted fifty-seven. A good field, thought I, being a stranger to all except one gent in the company. I knew I was the object of many a remark, and my mare also underwent a thorough scrutiny. My acquaintance soon came up, mounted on his nag Creeping Jane. He had been asked by twenty who I was, and had stated that I was an Irishman. Protheroo asked him if I could ride, and remarked that Irishmen were the d—l to go it, but my friend replied that I did not know the country. I was soon left to myself, and as the hounds had been full half an hour in cover, I was beginning to think it would be a blank. At this time I had my back to the cover, and the mare's head towards a haub on which was a small gorse bush, over which a man could have stepped. I fancied, in looking at it, that I saw something peering at me. I was convinced I saw a pair of eyes glaring at me; I continued to gaze at it till it became too painful to my sight. I winked—it was only for part of a second—and they were gone. I moved up one step, reached over the mare's neck to get a view on the other side, and about five yards off, in the like, a fine old fox, mangy on the back, and his brush all ragged, was stealing away. I waited a moment, then gave a Tallyho, with a heart and a will that brought every hound in the cover in a short time. "Hie over!" "forward!" "Tallyho!" were then the words, and the music began. Imagine fifty or sixty horsemen making a rush in one direction. When I gave the hounds a final cheer, I slackened my rein, and on flew the mare. Before me was a wide gap, which appeared to be somewhat sticking and deep, but who could wait and such thunder behind? Through the mud I faced, a plunge, and my mare is up to the chest, and I over her head! You have often seen a pig enjoy a 'siesta' on a July day in a pool of slugs; such was my appearance on emerging from the spot, and removing, as best I could, from my features the effects of my mishap. I saw my mare at a distance, with her bridle rein thrown over a gate post, and away went the gents of the hunt over the fences, topping it in beautiful style and in quick succession. "He does not know this country," was my first thought, when, with a few handfuls of long grass I gave myself a quick rub down, went to the mare, opened the gate, and up along the road in a parallel line, to which, streaming along at a racing pace, came hounds and horsemen. Lower Nash is skirted, the hill of Cochester crossed, Lawreney faced, and then a short turn to Goodmoor. Disdaining to enter, he races for Parkeson. But, good reader, you will ask how I know where I have been. On the road, dashing along; happily there was a net work of them there or my knowledge of their doings would have been very scanty. In making for Parkeson, I got a good start, and as the hounds came roaring down towards it, I got into a large pasture field fair in the way. I had scarcely entered it when I saw the fox coming down it at a fearful pace, and, forgetting all prudence and discretion, I cantered toward him and gave a halloo. As I did so, Mr. Allen, the master of the hounds, with a roar, came thundering down, and as he confronted me with a "d—n you, sir, what do you mean," the perfectly ludicrous and miserable plight I was in, was too much for his risible faculties, and, hurrying into an uncontrollable fit of laughter, he turned his horse and dashed along. The effects of my indiscretion was not so bad as it otherwise might have been. The locality saved me. When I headed him he turned in a parallel line to the hounds, who, running from scent to view, he narrowly escaped into a small planting, from which he soon emerged, and was again in the open. I joined in and passed a few fields, "gaps being very opportune." Parkeson availed was gained, a strong quickset hedge, with deep drop beyond, yet away they go. I passed along looking for a place to get through, but no sign there of horse or man having done so, though done before my eyes. Mare's head is now through, and over she goes—but how! On her head! giving me a sore crush; down the field, at the bottom of which is a small drain; no use to attempt crossing it; back again, up the avenue, and into the road near Milton. On nearing which the hounds crossed before me on the road; on I go through Milton, a couple of fields in advance of all, and along the road to Upper Nash, the hounds on my right-hand side; a lane is here—up it. Nash is passed through, and Felix himself went drooping across the lane, when not twenty yards in the next field, the foremost hound burst along; in with him I went—and not even Grantley Berkeley could beat the cheer I gave the gallant daintly as she pinn'd him in the field, whoop! whoop! and as they came straggling into the field, I had the brush in my hand.

"Not a bad beginning," said my friend, "but where the d—l were you all through?"

"Did you not see me?" was my reply, "but I suppose you had enough to do yourself."

He replied in the affirmative, and invited me to dinner. I willingly accepted the invitation, and off we went. I remarked him admiring my mare; indeed, once he said she was fully mistress of his weight. Over our glass of gin-toddy in the evening he offered to exchange his bay filly, by Sultan, dam by Record, for my mare. I asked what he would give me with her. He refused to give anything, stating that she was the making of the best mare in Pembrokehire. I laughed, told him not to think of such a thing, and to drop the subject. However, later in the evening, over another bumper, he returned to it. And that night I went home with the filly by Sultan, my fox's brush, and a ten-pound note in my pocket. Such was the result of "my first meet."

THE NEW CHELTENHAM STAG-HOUNDS.—Capt. West, a gentleman who, for the last few years, has hunted the Bath country with great satisfaction to the sportsmen of that district, having this season removed his establishment to Cheltenham, held his first meet at Audoversford on Friday. The morning proved fortunately very fine, and many took advantage of the circumstance to ride as far to witness the uncaring, which took place at noon. The hounds, after the usual law, were laid out, and a stag started off before them at a fleet pace, and passing through Dowdeswell Wood, was captured in the mill-pond at Prestbury, after a sharp run of about an hour and a half—the last twenty minutes of which was pronounced by the Nimrods who followed to have been excellent. From the way the hunt was conducted on this, its first appearance in the field, it may be safely said that Captain West will become a great favourite.—Cheltenham Chronicle.

SOUTH DOWN FOX HOUNDS.—The first meet for the season came off on Wednesday, at Ratton, the seat of the master, Freeman Thomas, Esq., and although the weather was most unpromising, there was a large attendance of country gentlemen, and many ladies (the latter, however, arriving in close carriages) to partake of the worthy Squire's hospitable fare. After the dinner, about fifty gentlemen, in "pink," turned out, including, from Brighton, Captains Botham and G. Ballard, Bowen May, G. Nash, and — Vusittart, Esqs. Lord Cranston and Lord Sheffield were not present. A fox was soon unkennelled, which ran to the Downs; and, after a run of about half an hour, was killed in the open. Another fox was found; but the weather was too severe even for these veteran sportsmen, and the hounds were whipped off about three o'clock.

THE EARL FITZGERARD'S HOUNDS will leave Berkeley Castle on Monday next for their Cheltenham kennels, to commence their season. They have had a capital cub-hunting. On Wednesday, Nov. 1, they will meet at Down Natherley; on Saturday, Nov. 4, at Broadway Country.

WINSLOW.—This town presents brilliant arrangements for the forthcoming hunting season. M. Manrice, Esq., of the Times, is about to make Winslow his headquarters, in the place of Addington House, which is passing into the hands of the great financier, J. G. Hubbard, Esq.; and other gentlemen are making arrangements for quarters amongst us. The Bell Hotel, as usual, will be fully occupied; for months improvements have been in progress for increasing the capabilities of that well-known establishment.

A very valuable little work on this subject has just been brought out by the Appletons, of New York, containing a collection of the best treatises that have appeared in Europe.

SPORTING MISCELLANEOUS.

TREATMENT AND MANAGEMENT OF HORSES.

The first thing of importance in the treatment of a horse is, that his stable should be light, clean, and well ventilated. If a stable is dark, partial or total blindness of the animal is the consequence. The window should be towards the south, so that the horse when resting in the day time may have the benefit of the sun's rays, which are as necessary to him as to man. When the stable is very light the inner walls should not be lime whitened, as the light reflected from a white surface is highly injurious to the eyes; they should be a dark-grey or stone colour. The next most important thing to be considered is ventilation. The door should be at the north end of the stable, and the window at the south, or, whatever points of the compass they are situated at, so as to be opposite to each other; they will thoroughly ventilate the stable when the horse is absent. Different modes of ventilation have been tried, but the two that have answered best have been the simplest. The one was having three or four panes of glass taken out of the window, putting perforated zinc in their place. The other was by taking a brick out of each of the side walls, every six feet, taking care to have the holes made as near the roof as possible, by which means a thorough, though gentle, draft was always kept up, not enough to give a horse cold, but ample for ventilation. A moment's consideration as to the necessity of pure air shows the utmost importance of ventilation, and yet men will continue to keep their horses in dark and unventilated stables. Ventilation is as necessary in winter as summer, and there is less risk of injuring horses by cold than by inhaling impure air. The horse inhales atmospheric air and exhales carbonic acid gas, one of the most deadly of gases to animal and vegetable life, which, if the stable is not properly ventilated, become mixed with the pure air, and is inhaled again and again, and lays the foundation of diseases innumerable.

The next consideration is cleanliness. There is an old saying, "that cleanliness is next to godliness;" and if it is so with man, it is equally so with cattle. Many persons believe, or pretend to believe, that the more cattle stand and sleep in their old filth, the more they thrive. This is an error of ignorance or idleness—perhaps both. Farmers defend this mode of allowing a horse to live and sleep in its own filth, on the ground that by so doing he improves the manure; as if the value of the manure was to be compared with the value of the horse. Brick and stone floors are the best for stables, slanting towards the gutter which carries off the urine. The inclination of the floor should be an inch and a half to a yard. Litter should always be allowed for a horse to stall upon, as it is easily removed, and a little water thrown down occasionally will keep the stables free from smells. Outside the stable, a tub should be sunk with suitable openings, so that the urine that leaves the stable may be collected, and if a little sulphuric acid is added occasionally, nothing can exceed its value as a manure. The more room a horse has in its stall the better, and if it can have a loose box, so much more will he thrive. All wet litter in the horse's absence ought to be taken out of doors and dried, and then, when thoroughly dried, will form a good bottom for a fresh bed. The next consideration is the horse's food; this should be oats, beans, and hay, of the best quality. Some persons give their horses musty corn and bad hay, because it is cheaper; but perhaps they are not aware that it is the most expensive way possible to feed horses, for with bad food you buy (whether you bargain for it or not) indigestion, general debility, and diseases too costly to purchase into any stable. The quantity of corn per diem that a horse ought to have depends upon his work; if he is worked daily he ought to have as much as he will eat. Water is as necessary to a horse as food, and horses are found to thrive better by having water ad libitum than by being stinted. The best way is to have the manger divided, so that the corn may be in one half and the water in the other; by this plan the horse takes the water as he wants it, and not when it is offered to him. The plan of having the water in the manger has been tried by a great number of the London merchants and found to answer admirably. W. A.

WOODCOCKS.—Woodcocks have made their appearance in this county early this year. Mr. Holdsworth, shooting in company with Mr. Frederick Hockin, killed a fine bird on Saturday, Oct. 14, at Kingswear, near Dartmouth. Another woodcock was killed at Thorverton a day or two before.—Exeter Gazette.

A SPORTING INCIDENT.—Two gentlemen were lately shooting in company, when one of them, to the alarm of his friend, made a spasmodic start back and sharp cry, and in a trice discharged first one barrel and then the other of his fowling-piece, at some near-at-hand object on the brow of a bank or face of a moss-hag. It was two adders of unusual size, which were coiled up and hissing as for a spring at the sportsman, when they first caught his eye and made him start back, shout, and shudder, as stated. One of them measured two-and-a-half feet, the other two feet. The latter was the thickness of a lady's wrist.—Inverness Courier.

RARE BIRD.—On Saturday last a specimen of that very rare bird, the bittern or mire-drum, was shot on the Possil estate, in the immediate neighbourhood of this city. The bittern (Ardea Stellaris) is so very nearly extinct in this country that it is believed that nearly half a century has elapsed since there has been a similar instance of one falling under the aim of the sportsman in this part of Scotland. It is a beautiful bird, resembling the heron in shape, but smaller, and coloured like a woodcock, and is remarkable for the obstinate defence it makes when wounded. This specimen, being only winged, spring at the face of the sportsman; and, although he was nearly six feet high, the bird actually tore a piece out of his shirt-collar. Thompson, Southey, Scott, and other poets have written of this wild and solitary bird, so remarkable for its lonely habits, and the peculiar and loud booming sound it makes in spring, and few birds have been invested with more poetic interest and mystery. The bird has been presented to Mr. Dougall, gunsmith, Gordon-street, who, we dare say, will be happy to show it to lovers of natural history, and it will doubtless be most carefully preserved.—Glasgow Constitutional.

SINGULAR CAPTURE OF A WOODCOCK.—A few days ago Mrs. Hammill, of Saltland-house, Rivers-side, was crossing the courtyard adjoining the house, when she observed a woodcock on the ground, which she immediately captured without much difficulty. The bird was a very fine one, and did not appear to be at all wounded.

SPORT ON THE CASTLE MENZIES PROPERTY.—The annual battue of Alexander Duncan, Esq., Castle Menzies, commenced on Tuesday, the 17th, and ended on Thursday, the 19th. Sir Robert Menzies and his brother, F. N. Menzies, Esq., of Tirinzie, were at the head of the party. Game of all kinds (including roe, hares, partridges, grouse, pheasants, and rabbits) was very numerous. The party killed upwards of 650 head.—Edinburgh Courier.

"FOX V. HARE."—We understand an open rupture has arisen between two landed proprietors of this and adjoining parishes. The one wishes to preserve foxes; the other cares nothing about foxes, and is even suspected of the dire offence of destroying them; but game, and especially hares, are preserved, until they have become a nuisance to the farmers in the neighbourhood. However, there has been an open rupture between the two squires, and we shall probably soon hear something of the great game case, "Fox v. Hare," in our courts of law.—Cambridge Press.

The next General Monthly Meeting will be held at Auderton's Hotel, 164, Fleet-street, on Tuesday, Nov. 7th, at eight o'clock precisely, when the following gentlemen will be ballotted for:—Lieut. Maturin, R.N., 42, King-street, Woolwich; Mr. A. Ford, 6, Hemming-row, Charing-cross; Mr. W. Reed, Northbury House, Barking, Essex; and Mr. Alfred Moore, 11, Park-gate, Paddington-green. those members (and to those only) who may have furnished the Honorary Secretary with twelve postage envelopes, with name and address already written thereon, and have subscribed also one shilling for the Printing Fund." (It will be understood that this is an alteration merely of the present General Rule, No. 12.) The nomination of officers for the ensuing year will also take place, the election to follow at the December meeting. The present officers are eligible for re-election; but as the Commodore, from private reasons, declines to re-serve, it is particularly requested that no member be put in nomination to hold office without his qualifications being first maturely considered, and his own sanction obtained, by the member who proposes him. Three gentlemen are spoken of, for the office of Commodore, the Vice-Commodore having again declined to be promoted.

YANKEE YACHTING.

REGATTA AT NEWPORT.

I send you, at my earliest leisure, a report of the regatta at Newport. The day was all that could be desired, a strong breeze from the north-east enabling the yachts to make excellent time, and thoroughly testing their several abilities.

At ten o'clock, on the arrival of the steamer Blackstone from Providence, the steam yacht Firefly took her station off Fort Adams, with the judges on board, who recorded the time of the boats as they passed. In half an hour they were all in motion, accompanied by nearly one hundred sail-boats of all shapes and sizes. The superiority of the Maria was apparent from the start. She took the lead, and kept it with the utmost ease. The contest between the other boats was more exciting.

The stake-boat was placed some twenty-five miles at least from the starting-point, thus making the distance sailed fully fifty miles instead of forty. The second prize of $100, the amount of the entrance money, was taken by the Ella Jane, of Harlem, as by the conditions of the race it was not contended for by the boats belonging to the New York Yacht Club. The following yachts contended for the prizes:—

Sloop Maria	116 tons	New York Yacht Club.
Sloop Ella Jane	89 tons	Harlem.
Sloop Julia	80 tons	New York Yacht Club.
Sloop Haze	80 tons	"
Sloop Connelia	78 tons	"
Sloop Gertrude	60 tons	"
Sloop Una	55 tons	"
Sloop Irene	48 tons	"
Sloop Mystery	44 tons	"
Sloop Spray	37 tons	"
Sloop America	29 tons	Philadelphia.

Below you will find the time of starting and returning, and the time occupied by each boat in the race:—

	Start.	Return.	Time.
Maria	10 19 30	3 12 30	1 53 00
Julia	10 21 40	3 24 30	1 03 14

Haze	10 26 10	3 16 35	1 20 25
Spray	10 31 18	3 29 40	1 27 52
Gertrude	10 15 00	3 19 39	1 34 37
Irene	10 24 19	4 01 11	1 37 01
Ella Jane	10 23 45	1 00 11	1 42 28

America	10 10 40	4 23 53	1 04 13

The Maria took the first prize, a silver pitcher, value $500. The Ella Jane took the second, $100.—Yours, PROVIDENCE.

* We shall feel obliged by the Secretaries of "Rowing Clubs," and others forwarding their Appointments of Matches or Notices of Meetings to come, at those early convenience.

MATCHES APPOINTED.

- November 10.—Cambridge University Four-oared Races commence.
 November 20.—T. Cole (the Champion of the Thames) and J. Messenger, of Teddington, to row from Putney to Mortlake, for £200 a side.
 November.—Robert Newell and William Pocock, to row from Putney Bridge to the Ship at Mortlake, for £25 a side.

MATCH BETWEEN MANEY AND ROLLS.—The long-talked-of race between R. Maney and J. Rolls, for £250 a side, took place on Monday, and created considerable interest. Their rival pretensions had been repeatedly questioned by their friends, and the preliminaries of the match were succeeded by bets to a stish amount, at even. The course was from Putney to Mortlake. Rolls first made his appearance, and had a "shower-bath" in his boat, which we opine is a bad way of taking it, when a fellow is going to row a wager. His adversary was a better judge, and stopped till the rain was over, which certainly gave him an advantage. Upon the signal being given, both started evenly and well, and were scull and scull, with alternate shoots, till, nearing the Crab Tree, both rowing extremely ducky and well. At the Crab Tree Maney began to show a superiority of strength, the lumpy water in Coney Reach giving him an advantage of a clear length and a half, which he never lost, and but little increased. The pace was remarkably good, only twenty-five minutes being occupied. Rolls's cutter kept considerably too far behind him.

STUD OF NAPOLEON THE THIRD.—Both the Emperor's stud and establishment at St. Cloud and that at Boulogne are under the superintendence of the premier piqueur of his Majesty, Mr. Gamble, whose thorough knowledge of the points and treatment of the animals under his care is well-known to the English sporting world. The general control of the stud is confided by the Emperor to Colonel Fleury, Premier Ecuyer to his Majesty. In the saddle room are seen two gorgeous saddles and bridles, presented to the Emperor by the Sultan, the saddle-cloths of which are most richly embroidered with gold, all the mountings being of solid gold, and the bit of silver-gilt. One of these saddles, &c., was used by the Emperor when riding out one day with Prince Albert. Its value is estimated at 250,000 francs. Another splendid saddle, with crimson velvet seat, was a present from Abd-el-Kader, with three Arab horses. The imperial carriages and liveries are of dark green; the former are all manufactured in Paris. Few things grieved Louis Napoleon more than being obliged, when President, to break up his stud and dispose of his horses; but now that his exalted position supplies him with the requisite resources, he loses no occasion of obtaining the best English horses that money can procure.

THE COURT.

The Queen and the other members of the Royal Family are still at Windsor. A number of distinguished guests have had the honour of invitations to the Castle during the week; among these have been the French Ambassador and Countess Walewski, Viscount and Viscountess Hardinge, the Duke of Newcastle, the Earl and Countess Granville, Lady Caroline Barrington, Lieut.-Colonel H. Vyse, Commanding Officer Royal Horse Guards, Major Spitty, Commanding Officer Essex Rifles, and others. Prince Albert has been out frequently during the week, shooting in the vicinity of the Castle. A few days ago M. Foucault had the honour of exhibiting before his Royal Highness some experiments with the gyroscope, in demonstration of the rotation of the globe.

Lord de Tabley has succeeded Lord Waterpark as Lord in Waiting, and Major-General Berkeley Drummond has succeeded Mr. J. R. Ormsby Gore as Groom in Waiting.

VISIT OF THE EMPEROR AND EMPRESS OF THE FRENCH TO THE COURT OF ENGLAND.—The Queen and Prince Consort, after celebrating the 14th birthday of the Princess Royal at Windsor Castle, on the 21st of November, will proceed with the Royal Family to the Isle of Wight. The Court will remain at Osborne until about the middle of December, when, it is said—though nothing definitive has as yet been determined on the subject—the Emperor and Empress of the French will pay their first visit to the British Court. On the arrival of the illustrious visitors, her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert will, it is expected, accompany them to Windsor Castle, where a series of magnificent banquets, balls, concerts, &c., will be given. During his stay, the Emperor will be installed a Knight of the Garter. The three knights who have also been nominated to fill the vacancies occasioned by the demise of the Marquis of Anglesea, the Marquis of Londonderry, and the Duke of Beaufort—namely, the Earls of Carlisle, Ellesmere, and Elgin—will also be installed at the same time. Should the weather admit, there will be a review of the Royal Horse Guards and other troops in the neighbourhood of Windsor, but there will be no attempt at any grand military display. We understand that the portion of the Castle occupied by the King of Prussia, when he last visited England, will be fitted up for the express use of the Emperor and Empress and suite during their stay at Windsor.

FASHIONABLE WORLD.

The Duke of Hamilton arrived in town from Germany early in the present week, and has since left London for Brodick Castle, Isle of Arran. The Duchess and her grace's youthful family are still staying with the Grand Duchess Dowager Stephanie.

The Duke and Duchess of Bedford will receive a succession of visitors at Woburn Abbey for the next two months. We understand that a series of amateur dramatic exhibitions is in contemplation for the approaching festive season.

The Duke and Duchess of Wellington are at Strathfieldsaye, Hants. Lady Sarah Ramsay, daughter of the Marquis of Dalhousie, who is staying with the noble duke and duchess, leaves to join her father in India early in the ensuing month.

The Duke and Duchess of Norfolk, and Lady Fitzalan Howard, are sojourning at Arundel Castle, where Lord and Lady Foley and a select circle are being entertained.

The Marquis of Bath leaves his shooting quarters in the Highlands next week, for Longleat Park, Wilts.

The Earl of Beverley and Lady Louisa Percy have arrived in Portman square, from visiting the Bishop of Carlisle, at the Episcopal Palace in Cumberland. We understand that his lordship has received favourable accounts of his son, the Hon. Colonel H. Manners Percy, of the Grenadier Guards, who was wounded at the Alma.

The Earl of Eglinton has arrived at the Clarendon, from Eglinton Castle, Ayrshire.

The Earl and Countess of Durham are entertaining a select family party at Lambton Castle.

Lord and Lady Willoughby d'Eresby leave Drummond Castle, Perthshire, next week, for Grimsthorpe, Lincolnshire.

Lord Dufferin is an invalid at Glenquoich, the seat of Mr. Ellice, M.P. He has but recently returned from the Baltic, where he had been making a cruise in his yacht.

Lord and Lady Edward Fitzalan Howard are passing the season in the Isle of Wight.

Mr. Knight and Miss Knight have left the Clarendon for Henley Hall, near Ludlow.

The Rev. W. Vernon Harcourt and family, and the Rev. Charles Vernon Harcourt, have left Edwards's Private Hotel, George-street, for Bolton Percy, near Taster.

We are requested to state that the Duc de Grammont, the brother of the Countess of Tankerville, was not among those who perished on board the Arctic steamer. He is at this time at his country house, in very delicate health.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Württemberg died on Saturday last, aged eighty-nine.

We have to announce the death of the Countess of Stamford and Warrington, who expired at two o'clock on Sunday morning, at Brighton.

A despatch from Munich, of the 26th inst., states that the Queen-Mother had died of cholera.

THE PERRY FUND.—This Defence and Testimonial Fund amounts to £2,425.

BEDFORD, Oct. 26.—Mr. Henry Stuart, M.P. for this borough, died suddenly this morning. There is, therefore, a vacancy in the representation.

METROPOLIS.

THE PUBLIC HEALTH.—(From the Registrar-General's Report).—The deaths registered in London, which, in the first two weeks of October were 1,532 and 1,394, declined in the week that ended last Saturday to 1,321. In the ten weeks of the years 1844-53, corresponding to last week, the average number was 942, which, being raised in proportion to increase of population, becomes, 1,036. About 300 persons died last week more than could be estimated from the experience of former years at the middle of October. Last week the deaths from cholera were 163. The mortality from the epidemic declines, but not so rapidly as in the same month of 1849. In three weeks of October in that year the deaths were 288, 110, and 41; in the last three weeks of the existing epidemic they have been 411, 249, and 163. The fatal cases of diarrhoea and dysentery were 102 and 106 in the first two weeks of the present month; last week they declined to 83. In comparing the returns from the five metropolitan divisions for the last two weeks the improvement which they show is greatest on the north side of the river. Of the five northern districts cholera lingers most in Marylebone, though the mortality in it is not great. In the last two weeks the deaths in that district were 9 and 12; while in Pancras, with a larger population, there were only three last week, which occurred in Camden-town. Only one death occurred last week in Islington, and one in Hackney. Among the sub-districts on the south side of the river still haunted by the disease are St. James, Bermondsey, the Kent-road sub-district, and St. Peter, Walworth. A table published last week, but now embracing the returns of an additional week, shows that 2,853 deaths from cholera occurred in seven weeks in the 40,046 houses supplied with water from the Thames at Battersea, and 302 in the 26,107 supplied from the Thames at Thames Ditton.

VALUE OF LAND IN THE EASTERN DISTRICTS OF LONDON.—The banks of the Thames above and below the East and West India Docks being nearly exhausted for wharfage purposes, the increase of new wharfs on the river Lea for some miles up has been of late years very remarkable, and land that was only a marsh cannot now be bought under £1,000 an acre. New towns are springing up in the direction of Stratford and Bow, every available field being eagerly sought after for building operations. The Conservative Land Society has just acquired a valuable estate at Old Ford, in the parish of Saint Mary, Stratford-le-Bow, within the borough of the Tower Hamlets. The land is within 200 yards of Victoria Park and Sir George Duckett's canal, and about a quarter of a mile from the Bow station of the Eastern Counties Railroad.

LICENSED VICTUALLERS' PROTECTION SOCIETY.—The twenty-first anniversary of this society took place on Wednesday last, at the London Tavern, and was attended by an unusually large number of the trade. George Sewall, Esq., presided, supported by Mr. Alderman Wire, Mr. Alderman Rose, E. Down, Esq., G. Evans, Esq., R. Clarke, Esq., E. Vickers, Esq., Mr. Findley, chairman of the committee, Messrs. Hale, Browne, Shepherd, Kirkpatrick, and J. Clarke, trustees; Messrs. Bryon, G. Walter, Jones, Hughes, Rountree, and Winterbotham, past chairmen; and Messrs. James and Smith, treasurer and secretary of the Protection Society. Mr. Palmer, chairman of the Asylum; Messrs. Raven, Sinclair, and Hughes, past chairmen; Mr. Titchener, past trustee; Mr. Kilburn, governor of the Incorporated Society; Mr. Wickens, trustee; Messrs. Wratten, C. Fox, Clarke, Gabb, Smyth, committee-men; Messrs. Jones and Horner, past governors; Messrs. Bromley, Toulson, Sinnett, and Finney; Mr. W. Smalley, secretary; Joseph Stinton, Esq., chairman of the United Towns Association; Messrs. Perry, Minshule, Harcourt, and Harrison, from Birmingham; Messrs. Simpson, of Cremorne, A. Hutton, of Highbury, and above three hundred others. Mr. Alderman Wire, Messrs. T. Smith, Homer, Findley, Kilburn, Clarke, Smalley, Winterbotham, &c., severally addressed the meeting on behalf of the society, the great speech of the evening being that of Alderman Wire, who proposed the chairman's health, in which he took the opportunity of urging unanimity among the trade, and not by dissension in the camp to place themselves in the power of the enemy. He adverted to the intention of the Legislature to introduce a measure into Parliament next session, for the purpose of free-trading in spirits, which, if brought to bear, would render England like what Ireland and Scotland were some time since—a scene of drunkenness, riot, and disloyalty. After a lengthened speech, the Alderman concluded by proposing the health of the Chairman, George Sewall, Esq., who acknowledged the toast, briefly alluding to the value of the Protection Society. The subscriptions amounted to nearly £300, and the company separated at a late hour, delighted with the evening's entertainment, which was enhanced by an excellent musical choir, under the direction of Mr. G. Taylor, who presided at the pianoforte, assisted by Miss Marian Taylor (who sang Rossini's "Di piacer" in a manner to elicit an unanimous encore), Miss Ada Taylor, Messrs. Fielding, Grove, Elton, Williams, and T. Roberts, the American vocalist.

DEPARTURE OF REINFORCEMENTS FOR THE GUARDS IN THE CRIMEA.—In obedience to orders issued by the Commander-in-chief, the detachments of the three regiments of Foot Guards under orders for embarkation to join the service companies of their respective battalions in the Crimea, were paraded on Thursday morning in their respective barrack squares—viz., 80 for the third battalion Grenadier Guards, 50 for the first battalion Coldstream Guards, and 100 for the first battalion Scots Fusilier Guards, making a total reinforcement of 230. The detachments having been inspected, the respective commanding officers addressed the men; and precisely at eight o'clock the Grenadiers marched from Wellington barracks to the terminus of the South-Western Railway. The Coldstream Guards and the Scots Fusiliers, who met in Trafalgar-square, marched along the Strand to the railway terminus. Several thousand of both sexes lined the different thoroughfares leading to the station for the purpose of seeing the brave fellows pass along, and cheered the soldiers most heartily. The three bands of the different regiments accompanied the men, and played some lively airs along the streets; but on reaching the platform of the station the Fusiliers' band struck up the "Highland Laddie," after which the Coldstream band played "Cheer, boys, cheer," and the other band played "The girl we left behind us." The troops having taken their seats in the different carriages, the three bands struck up "Britannia rules the waves," and every soldier present joined in the chorus. The effect was quite thrilling. Whilst that proceeding was going on, a number of the wives and their children were allowed to accompany their husbands to the platform, and the scene, as the train moved, was painful in the extreme. Women and children were clinging to the doors of the carriages, crying, and taking perhaps their last farewell to all those dear to them in this world. The moment the train commenced moving, the hands struck up "God save the Queen!" when one unanimous shout was given, which might have been heard half a mile distant. The arrangements of the police, under Inspectors Dargan and Bent of the A division, and a powerful muster of the L division, were most excellent, and a clear space was kept by them for the soldiers to enter the terminus.

Our Opera-Glass.

ADRIEN.—An excellent and varied programme is put forth for Monday evening, and during the week. The performances will commence with the excellent comedy by Morris Barnett, entitled "The Serious Family." This will be followed by a new and original farce, from the facile pen of William Brough, Esq., called "Bonâ-fide Travellers," from which title we surmise that the author has prepared a smart rap for the obnoxious Beer Bill. The principal characters are allotted to Messrs. Keeley, Paul Bedford, and Mrs. Keeley—powerful auxiliaries to the author, who has already achieved considerable popularity as a dramatic writer. Mark Lemon's successful farce, "The Camp at Choldham," having been "botly called for," will also be given; and the evening's amusements will wind up with "Mephistopheles." During the past week the audiences have been numerous, spite of the adverse elements which, on some occasions, prevailed.

DRURY-LANE.—Messrs. Jullien's concerts will commence at this theatre on Monday next, Oct. 30. [See advertisement.] THE HAYMARKET AND ROYAL PRINCESS'S THEATRES are both open and doing good business.

SADLER'S WELLS.—Mr. Phelps is rejoicing in crowded houses.

ASTLEY'S.—Taking up a morning paper yesterday (Friday), our eye fell upon the following paragraph:—"MAXIMON HOUSE.—The Lord Mayor requested that the press would favour him by the insertion of the following grateful acknowledgment:—'Mr. Cooke, the proprietor of Astley's Royal Amphitheatre, has paid into the hands of the Lord Mayor the sum of £60. 10s. 6d., being the amount of the proceeds of a night's entertainment given at the theatre, for the relief of the sick and wounded soldiers in the East.' Mr. Cooke deserves all honour, not merely for this generosity, but for coming forward so promptly in the 'good cause,' especially when we consider the very heavy expense, yet unrepaid, to which he has just been put in bringing out 'The Battle of Alma,' itself the chief origin of the necessity for a national subscription on the behalf of our brave soldiers combating under Lord Raglan, and whose gallant deeds abroad first furnished Mr. Cooke with the idea of the grand spectacle, produced for the first time on Monday night, for the delectation of her Majesty's lieges—those 'gentlemen of England who stay at home at ease.' The spectacle has deservedly met with the most extraordinary success. It is the best piece ever produced at Astley's, and this is saying a great deal for all concerned in its production. The scene is laid at Southampton and in the Crimea—the leave-taking and the embarkation coming off in the one, and the incidents of the war in the other. On entering the theatre, the platform which connects the stage with the arena cannot but attract considerable attention; and we may also mention that its easy removal, prior to the scenes in 'the ring,' proves very creditable to its architect, whoever he may be. Its capabilities are put to the test in the very first scene. The Guards, Rifles, and Highlanders, enter the arena, and, with their mounted officers, march up the platform and to the back of the stage, to embark in the steamers lying alongside the quays in Southampton docks; and here the appearance of 'real' soldiers in the mimic war, whose very comrades were engaged in the actual battle, gives a zest which the audience could only express by the most deafening cheering. Mr. W. Cooke cannot be too highly praised for the part he has taken in producing this spirit-stirring spectacle. The story is slight, being chiefly founded on Lord Raglan's despatches, with every word of which the public are already familiar. In the dialogue the Russians come in for many smart 'hits,' and in the action, too, last scene especially, the spectator almost forgets he is in a theatre. The heights of Alma occupy the back of the stage; the Russians are seen posted on the acclivities, each in his spiked helmet; the Cossacks descend and reconnoitre, galloping about the ring; then enter the British, and the Cossacks retreat; our Rifles skirmish with the enemy; the Highlanders and Guards arrive and open a fusillade, and then rush upon the foe with the bayonet; shells are thrown from the heights (one or two even reached the pit, thus adding to the confusion); four pieces of horse-artillery next dash in at a gallop under a cavalry escort, and advance at the same speed right up the platform, nimbly, and open fire; and at last the Muscovites are (as they ever ought to be) routed, and the banners of the allies are planted on the heights of Alma. In the middle of the piece some capital dancing is introduced, far better than one could believe possible on a stage necessarily roughened by frequent equestrian performances. But the corps d'élite Astley's can do anything; and some of their feats we shall record on a future occasion, especially those of the Lilliputian Sportsmen, Masters Alfred and Henry Cooke, who are worthy 'chips of the old block.' Praise is due to Mr. William Cooke, jun., Mr. Campbell, Mr. Jones Holloway, Mr. John Cooke, and 'our own correspondent,' also, to Messrs. Lloyd, and Stoyke, and Cracklock; while, among the ladies, favourable notice must be taken of Mrs. Jackson and Miss Wildenar, and Misses Blanche and Caroline. In conclusion, we advise 'all hands' to pay a visit to Astley's, and at once, for the capture of Sebastopol may render a new spectacle necessary.

EXHIBITIONS.—The Turkish Museum, at Hyde-park Corner, is still well attended, and now that its charge is reduced to one shilling (Saturdays excepted), bids fair to send much money from its doors.—Madame Tussaud's exhibition has, among other novelties, added the figures of Lieut. Perry, Mr. Brooke the tragedian, and the Emperor of Russia.

The Panopticon has made a 'hit' in its illuminated fountain, and its lectures also are much more interesting than formerly.

THE CRYSTAL PALACE.—The band of the Imperial Regiment of Guides arrived from Paris by the South-Eastern Railway on Thursday evening. The Emperor has permitted the band to visit London solely for the purpose of aiding the funds now raising for the relief of the sufferers in the English army by playing at the military concert at the Crystal Palace to-day (Saturday). The band of the Guides is the private band of the Emperor, and consists of fifty-six members. It is under the charge of the Baron de Verdiero, captain on the Emperor's staff, and the Baron Vidal, one of the officers of the Regiment of Guides. Quarters have been prepared for the members of the band at the St. George's Barracks, Trafalgar-square. The above two officers attended the relieving guard on Friday morning at the Colour-court, St. James's Palace.

PADDY'S PORTFOLIO.—No one has recently improved so rapidly as Mr. Holdson, whose nightly performances in the Quadrant, under the above title, have fairly taken the town by storm. His entertainment is well written, well and rapidly spoken, the songs well selected, and accompanied, the dramatic imitations evident on the instant, the costumes smartly changed, and the action of the performance admirably sustained and undragging. So full was the attendance on the last night of our own attendance that, notwithstanding the civility of the employés, we could not obtain a seat; but we felt no fatigue, and the laughter, in which we joined company with scores, refreshed us much more than a night's amusement is wont to do.

THEATRE ROYAL, EDINBURGH.—Mr. Benjamin Webster and Madame Celeste concluded a most successful engagement on Saturday evening, when the house was crowded, as, indeed, it has been, more or less, for the past fortnight. The "summer" season was brought to a close last night, when the performances were for the benefit of Mr. and Mrs. Wynham. To add to the attractions of the programme, the gratuitous services of the two "stars" were given. During the evening, the manager delivered the following Farewell Address, written by a famed hand in such matters:—

(Mr. WYNHAM enters hastily.)

Have patience, O ye gods!—wherefore this riot?
I've come at last—surely you'll now be quiet.
Pray be content that war abroad should roam,
And let us have some little peace at home!
Greater your din than when, with such success,
Sébastopol was captured by—the Press!
Rest ye assured, I need no spur nor cue
To render homage where I know 'tis due.
And yield my heart-felt thanks, kind friends, to you.

The worry that we managers endure
Would kill the Czar of Moscow, I'm sure:
'Mid authors, actors, one thing and another,
Our life is one continual scene of bother.
Authors, who will insist their play's the thing,
Fame, fortune, every earthly good to bring;
Actors, who swear we keep their genius down,
Lest they usurp our favour with the town;
Capricious dames to this and that objecting,
And singers inconvenient colics affecting;
Our choicest artists, too, are lured away
By sanguine men, who promise better pay;
Some of your favourites, as we are told,
Now seek Australian shores in quest of gold,
Nor think it infra dig. Your smiles and praise
Could not retake them—Mammon has such ways.

A greater ill than these our course attends—
The interference of good-natured friends.
"Wyndham, my boy, why don't you?" this one cries;
Another, "Don't do that, if you are wise."
A third, "Take my advice—'twill prove a hit!
I speak, my friend, but for your benefit."
If this we acted on, I fear—in fact,
We'd shortly reap the benefit of the Act.

Like husbandmen who've safely housed their grain,
Our season past has not been passed in vain;
Success has crowned us, and we now prepare
To sow our winter wheat with double care,
Hopeful, when spring arrives, we still may tell
That our well-tended crop has turn'd out well.
For this success, achieved despite the wars,
Like Smith, the poet, I may thank my Stars.
Bright shone my Stars. Particular and bright
Are those which grace our hemisphere to-night.
Of more than common brilliancy possessed—
Accomplished Webster, and the fair Celeste.

Parents there are, and guardians, now-a-days,
Who execrate all theatres and plays;
Others there are, more civilised, who may Be only caught when Fashion leads the way:
Some plead the war—high prices—Income-tax,
And other burdens put upon their backs.
For their behoof I've got full information
How taxes soon will cease throughout the nation,
And how it is proposed to make our fies
Pay off our debts, when they're paid off with blows.
For Ministers have hastened—oh! so fast—
To plan attacks on Russia's land at last.
So far they've carried out their project well,
As Alma's blood-stained helms can truly tell.
I take my leave. Ere long we'll come again,
Renewed in vigour for a fresh campaign,
When, I would fondly hope, with smiles around,
The old familiar faces may be found.
Trust me, your favours in our hearts shall dwell,
And ever claim our gratitude. Farewell!

FIRE AT THE QUEEN'S THEATRE.—Between four and five o'clock on Wednesday morning the Queen's Theatre, in Tottenham-street, Tottenham-court-road, narrowly escaped destruction by fire, which, it appears, broke out at the back part of the stage, under the flooring. When discovered, the flames had possession of the whole of the flooring, joisting, and scenery, and but for the promptitude displayed by the police and the speedy arrival of the engines, the entire building must have quickly burned to the ground. The cause of the fire is not yet ascertained. Previous to the above outbreak no fewer than nine other fires had occurred in the course of the morning in various parts of the Metropolis, but were got under in time before any serious mischief had occurred.

THE POLICE OBTWITTED.—It was stated, some time ago, that a comedian, belonging to the theatre at Nantes, had determined to inflict personal chastisement on a journalist of the place for some criticism passed on his wife, and that before meeting with the real offender he had assaulted a banker of the place, mistaking him for the journalist. After this he met the real offender, and assaulted him. A warrant having been issued for his arrest, he took refuge, says a Nantes journal, at the theatre, and was actually beneath the table at which the commissary of police, who had come in search of him, sat down, after examining the house without success, to draw up a procès verbal. A trap-door beneath the table enabled the actor to get down under the stage, but, the house being surrounded by sérgents de ville, he was obliged, in order to get out, to place himself in a trunk of his wife's, who was preparing to start for Paris, and in which he got clear off.—Galignani.

A NEW ACTRESS FOR WALLACK'S.—(From the New York Herald, Oct. 14.)—Miss Rosa Bennett, from the London theatres, has arrived in this city, and will shortly make her début at Wallack's theatre. She is a sister of Miss Julia Bennett, and is said to be possessed of beauty and talent. There is a scarcity of good comedy actresses in our theatres, and we trust that Miss Bennett will sustain the family reputation. Miss Bennett was to appear on Wednesday evening, the 18th inst., in Lady Guy Spunker, in Bourcicault's comedy of "London Assurance."

CONSTANTINOPLE.—There is little attraction now in the country, and the drawing-rooms of the Bosphorus will soon be deserted by their fair tenants, who are returning to prepare in town for a season which, it is hoped, will be brilliant. Should the success of the great enterprise in the Crimea be complete, there will, no doubt, be gaiety enough, so far as depends on private hospitality; but the public amusements of the place are few. Last spring there was a bad opera, attended only by English travellers in rough coats, and Perote bougre, redolent of garlic and raki.

ROSSINI'S HEALTH.—A letter in the Diabets gives a less distressing account of Rossini's health than the one recently published. It is written by his physician, and is as follows:—"Florence, Oct. 12. The news that I can give you are altogether good and consoling. Rossini has indeed suffered much during the long illness with which he has been afflicted during the last seven months, and even now it would be too much to say that he has perfectly recovered; but as to the lucidity of his mind, I can assure you that the illustrious convalescent is, and ever has been, as intelligent as when he gave his great works to the world.—The Doctor, FABRIS UCCELLI."

THE RIGHT TO HISS.—We have a very recent decision on this point. An action brought last week in Detroit, for ejecting a young man from the theatre for hissing a dansuse, has been decided against the ejector, McFarland, who was fined 30 dols. The justice gave it as his opinion that an auditor had a perfect right to hiss an actor or actress on the stage, if he had reason for so doing, and that no person had a right forcibly to eject a man from the theatre until he had first been requested to leave. So "popular sovereignty" triumphed.—New York Herald.

PROVINCIAL.

GREAT FIRE IN LIVERPOOL.

LIVERPOOL, Thursday.—Shortly before noon to-day a most extensive fire, which will be attended with considerable loss, broke out in four very large warehouses, situated in Lancelot's Hey, and in the midst of a densely populated neighbourhood. When the outbreak first became known much alarm was felt by the inhabitants, in consequence of there being a great quantity of East and West India produce in the buildings. The whole of the property belongs to Mr. Molyneux, and is situated opposite Fazakerley-street. It was well known that there were vaults underneath the cellars, in which large quantities of spirits were in bond, and above the vaults were numbers of barrels of spirits of turpentine, spirits of tar, resin, &c., and this knowledge added considerably to the opinions entertained as to the destructive results of the conflagration. The cellars in these warehouses had each communication with the other, and in one of them it was reported upwards of 100 barrels of turpentine were deposited, besides saltpetre, &c. Above these cellars, to the extent of six stories, were cotton, hemp, &c., which, with the other combustibles spoken of, belonged to Messrs. F. Campbell and Co., Mr. Hoarne, Messrs. Stollerfoht and Co. The spirits belonged to Mr. Hearne. The premises were what is termed certified warehouses, i. e. they were externally fire-proof, and as yet the origin of the fire is a mystery. However, it is certain that the vaults and cellars were entered with a lamp, and on this day it was noticed that the "bull's eye" of the lamp was cracked through. It had been used during the morning, but after the discovery of the fire it was found in the street. It was rumoured that a lighted candle, without any external protection, had been taken into the subterranean storehouses, and, as a natural result, an explosion took place. Be this as it may, the fire ascended from the cellars, and as it came in contact with the barrels of turpentine, &c., a loud explosion followed, occasionally inducing the lookers-on to retreat in the most precipitous manner. The intelligence of the fire was scarcely promulgated before the West of England engine and the corporate engines were on the spot, together with a large body of policemen. No order, however, seemed to prevail; the approaches to the warehouses were thronged with idle and indolent people undesirous of rendering any assistance; and if it had not been for the timely arrival of the mayor, J. B. Lloyd, Esq., that order and regularity which followed his injunctions would have been unknown. The fire ascended rapidly, and the mayor gave instructions for the clearance of the various avenues; and, being promptly obeyed, the firemen were enabled to do all that human effort could do—namely, to pour in copious quantities of water; for the density of the smoke, together with its suffocating tendency, nullified even any ordinary efforts to arrest the progress of the hidden fire. The proprietors and the tenants of the adjoining warehouses speedily busied themselves in the employment of large drays and other conveyances to remove the property deposited in their warehouses, consisting of cotton, sugar, sulphur, &c.; and the celerity with which their removal was accomplished was very satisfactory.

While all this was proceeding, dense columns of smoke obscured the sky, and, taking into consideration the narrowness of Lancelot's Hey, the corporation brigade discharged the duties assigned to it with commendable expedition and patience. At length, however, the men's lungs were unable to withstand the fumes which rose from the mass then burning secretly; and for personal safety most of those engaged in their hazardous occupation were obliged to withdraw some distance; still the engines played vigorously, but without much effect. The fire had gained a mastery, and at four o'clock (this afternoon) the flames burst out in awful grandeur, threatening destruction to the surrounding property. The flames had also assailed the roofs of the buildings, clearly showing that the ignitable property above the cellars was then being consumed. When our parcel was despatched, the utmost fear was manifested that the entire demolition of these warehouses must result, if not the destruction of the whole of the buildings adjoining.

THE FIFTH OF NOVEMBER.—The annual commemoration of Guy Fawkes-day in the city of Exeter—though usually of the most exciting and enthusiastic character—promises this year to outvie any proceedings of the kind for some years past. The utter defiance of magisterial and police authority, in the shape of prohibitory notices, on former occasions has induced a tacit permission on the part of the civic authorities for holding the usual bonfires, &c., and a grand illumination of the whole city has been projected for the joint commemoration of the Popish plot and the glorious victory of the allies on the heights of the Alva. Arrangements are in progress for giving due effect to the proposal, which is exceedingly popular with the citizens generally; and in the meantime the following address has been extensively circulated:—"The 5th of November, Guy Fawkes-day, falling on a Sunday this year, the annual celebration will be held on Monday, the 6th of November. In addition to the fireworks and the bonfire, let us have a general illumination on that evening, to celebrate both our deliverance from the fatal Popish plot and our glorious victory over the armies of the Russian Pope, who, under the cloak of religion, murdered in cold blood at Sinope 5,000 helpless Turks, and would have hatched all their countrymen and stolen their country, and all 'for the glory of God!' The Puseyites rave for unity with these two horrid Popes, one of whom would have blown up our Parliament, and the other has convulsed Europe with war, imposing on us a double income-tax and causing thousands of hearts to mourn with sorrowing widows and fatherless children—and all these horrors have been entailed upon us by the defender of the Greek Church under the sickly pretence of religion! Let the Puseyites do what they like; let them sigh for unity with Rome; let them protest against Bishop Gobat's receiving converts to the Church of England from the Greek Church; let them rant about unity with this precious Greek Church—a church stained red with the bloody tragedy of Sinope; but the Protestants of Exeter will alike repudiate the Pope of Rome and the Pope of Russia, by preparing their rockets and determining to illuminate! illuminate! illuminate! The Protestants of Exeter will stick fast to the church of their fathers—the good old Church of England. They will rally round their Protestant Queen and Protestant institutions, leaving Puseyites to whine for unity with the butcher Pope of Sinope and the Gry Fawkes Pope of Rome. God save the Queen. Exeter, Oct. 14."

THE REGISTRATIONS.—THE CONSERVATIVE LAND SOCIETY.—The following are the results of the claims in the Registration Court, for this year:—

* In Middlesex the Revising Barrister, Mr. Lancelot Shadwell, and in Herts, Mr. Fish, held that a purchase of a piece of land for £50 is, at least, a prima facie case of right to vote.

† In West Kent the Revising Barrister, Mr. Ogle, laid down the rule that he would not admit the right to vote in any case where the consideration money was not more than £50; but he admitted the £75 lots as sufficient.

‡ In East Surrey the Revising Barrister, Sir Walter Riddell, held, that unless the land was actually let, the owner has no right to the franchise, and seventeen claims were disallowed on this ground; but an appeal to the Court of Common Pleas was granted, which the Conservative Land Society will prosecute.

§ Four allottees lost their right because they had neglected to forward their conveyances for the inspection of the Court. Five, on the same estate, lost their privilege because they had not paid up the purchase-money in full.

SCOTLAND.

DEATH OF MR. ARCHIBALD M'LELLAN.—A BEQUEST TO THE PUBLIC.—The serious illness with which this gentleman was suddenly seized in the spring of the present year, has terminated in his demise, which took place on Saturday night, at his country residence, Mungdock Castle, Stirlingshire. Mr. M'Leilan has almost continuously occupied perhaps the most prominent position as a public man in Glasgow during the last forty years. His name on any side of a question was a tower of strength, for few could equal him for skill in debate. In parochial and poor-law matters he took a deep interest; and when the Poor Law Act came into operation, he was chosen the first chairman in the City Parochial Board. He was a most accomplished man, deeply read in the literature of his own and other countries; and, possessing a most retentive memory, he was ever ready to draw upon his faithful and well-stored archives for apposite remark or quotation. His library, as a private library, is unsurpassed in Glasgow, and is said to be worth £3,000; while his collection of pictures, chiefly by the old masters, together with his collection of statues in bronze and marble, is said to be worth £50,000. The valuable pictures are said to amount to between five and six hundred fine specimens; among which are single efforts which alone cost him upwards of £1,000. If report speaks true—and there is little reason to doubt it—Mr. M'Leilan, in the disposal of his fine art collection has erected an imperishable monument to his memory, which will retain a place in the gratitude of the people of Glasgow for ages to come. It is said that he has bequeathed his invaluable collection of pictures and statues, his library, and his gold and silver plate, to the corporation, for the purpose of founding a Fine Art Gallery in this his native city; and that, in connexion with this magnificent bequest, he has made provision for the establishment of a Fine Art chair in the University of Glasgow. Mr. M'Leilan was the friend and patron of native talent. He took a warm interest in the architectural renovation and embellishment of the city, and a prominent part in the restoration of the cathedral. He enjoyed the intimate friendship of Sir David Wilkie, Sir Francis Chantrey, R. A. Smith, Wm. Motherwell, and indeed of most of the distinguished painters, sculptors, musicians, literateurs, and other eminent men of the present century.—Glasgow Daily Mail.

IRELAND.

THE SICK AND WOUNDED IN TURKEY.—The following announcement appears in the Cork Reporter of Tuesday:—"This day three religieuses from the Convent of Mercy, Kinsale—namely, Mrs. Bridgeman, the Mother Superior; Sister Mary Clare (formerly Miss Kenne, of this city), and Sister Mary Joseph (formerly Miss Lynch, of this city), proceeded to Dublin, en route to Constantinople, to minister to our brave soldiers and sailors who may be wounded in the Eastern war. It is on the application of the Government, through the proper ecclesiastical authority, that these devoted ladies have volunteered to go on this mission of mercy. They will, we understand, be joined in Liverpool by some twenty or thirty more of their order, and by a Catholic chaplain, who will accompany them to the seat of war. The conduct of the Government in thus proclaiming its sense of the value of the services which the Sisters of Mercy can render is exceedingly creditable to it, and, at the same time, is a proud testimony in favour of our conventual institutions."

DUBLIN, Wednesday Evening.—The Mail announces the death of the Right Hon. James Grattan, which event took place suddenly yesterday at his residence, Trinchin, county of Wicklow. The right hon. gentleman was the eldest son of the late Right Hon. Henry Grattan, and represented the county of Wicklow in many Parliaments. He leaves no issue.

Foreign Intelligence.

FRANCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Thursday, Oct. 26.

The anxiety for news from Sebastopol continues most intense among all ranks. The last intelligence by the mail from Constantinople disappointed everybody, by the seeming dilatory nature of the proceedings, which, however unavoidable, contrasts terribly with the feverish impatience of the public. The Emperor and Empress were to have gone to Compiègne, and honoured the British Ambassador and Lady Cowley with a visit at their villa at Chantilly, on Sunday last; before which date the previous despatches had assured his Majesty he would be in possession of decisive intelligence. However, none arrived. The preparations were countermanded at the last hour, and an apology sent by telegraph. Their Majesties remain at St. Cloud until news arrive.

An attempt has been made here to get up a public meeting, to raise something of a subscription among the pleasure-seeking English in Paris, for the relief of the wounded, and the widows and orphans of their brave countrymen who fell on the banks of the Alma. But, to their disgrace be it recorded, this proposal was received with such lukewarmness by those whose wealth and social rank would have insured the success of the subscription, that the project of the meeting was abandoned. Subscription lists have, it is true, been opened at Galignani's, through whose paper a brief, well-conceived appeal to the English residents on the Continent was made in behalf of the sufferers; but, though that took place a week ago, no list of subscribers has yet appeared. This absence of every feeling of patriotism and charity is positively revolting, considering the many Englishmen residing at Paris, and other parts of France, including nobility, from marquises down to baronets and gentlemen, many of them possessing immense fortunes. This pitiful meanness ought really to be punished by the exposure of their names. Some of these unworthy sons of fortune, it is painful to observe, bear hereditary claims to the respect of their countrymen—that is to say, their ancestors left them distinguished names, which their present possessors are doing all they can to hurry to oblivion. We shall see, however, how the subscription list stands when it is made public; and, if it turn out as meagre and shabby as I fear it is likely to be, there will be a malicious consolation in sending you over a list of the names and titles of the wealthy non-subscribers to the "English Patriotic Fund in Paris," for the edification of the readers of THE FIELD.

The Palais de Justice, at once our Westminster Hall and Lincoln's Inn, has this week been chiefly occupied by matters theatrical. The "rigours of the law" were called down on two celebrated artistes, Mlle. Rachel and Mlle. Cruvelli. The great tragedian—so facile in her tastes, so changeable in her opinions—refused to act in a character which she had formally accepted and rehearsed—that of Medea, in a tragedy of that name, composed at her own suggestions by M. Legoume, a well known collaborator of M. Scribe.

It was hardly to be expected that even an old and intimate friend like M. L. could sacrifice his time, trouble, and reputation, and submit to the caprice of "la Demoiselle Felix," as she is designated in the forensic language of the Parisian bar. A numerous audience of idlers congregated within the precincts of the court, in the hopes that Rachel herself might attend to explain personally the causes of her antipathy for the luckless Medea. They were deceived in their expectations, yet a treat was reserved them in compensation, the "motives" of the fair artiste being set forth with a torrent of epigrammatic sallies by her counsel, the celebrated Châix-d'Est-Ang. But the case was hopeless; notwithstanding the talent and skill of the defence, the judgment was not for a single moment doubtful, and the court condemned Mlle. Rachel to resume the rehearsals of Medea on the earliest day which could be fixed, and subsequently perform in it, or pay the author an indemnity of 200 francs (£8) for every day's delay for the space of two months. Her friends hope she will retrieve herself in this affair by playing the part with a good grace, and make the most of it.

The other action brings us back to Mlle. Cruvelli, the hurricane of small talk and avalanche of suppositions caused by whose flight are far from having yet subsided. The tribunal has condemned the fair artiste to pay 20,000 francs (£800) damages to the Grand Opera, and, besides, an indemnity of 1,000 francs (£40) for every day's delay until she resumes her engagement. You are aware that, in consequence of the abruptness of her disappearance, the money had to be returned at the doors, and, as often occurs in such cases, considerably more money was returned than was taken, many of the audience admitted gratis, by orders, or, as they call them here, billets de faveur, quietly pocketing what they had never disbursed. The official pretext of the flight of the centaur, is gravely stated to be her annoyance on seeing her name printed on the affiche in the same kind of small type as those of Mlle. Poinet, Mons. Gueynard, and other second or third rates, on whom now rest the fortunes of the house. On this subject the following story is related:—At the moment when the performance ought to have commenced, the absence of the prima donna—being placed beyond question, half-a-dozen officials were dispatched, in hot haste, to La Cruvelli's lodgings. One inmate alone was found—a German valet-de-chambre—whose knowledge of French was limited to four words, taught him for the nonce. To all questions put by the Ministerial myrmidons, he returned, with imperturbable gravity, one answer, "Madame partie, grosses lettres." The real cause, as I intimated last week, is a dashing young fellow, Baron Vigier; and it is now asserted, on the "best authority," that the ex-Diva has become "Madame la Baronne." In the meantime the absence of La Cruvelli is telling with fatal effect on the interests of the Grand Opera in more ways than one. Besides a considerable diminution in the nightly receipts, M. Verdi has withdrawn his opera, declaring, that to produce it with the present company, would be to sacrifice it, as, with the best dispositions in the world, they were completely unequal to its execution; and, for similar reasons, Meyerbeer has refused to bring forward his "Africaine." All these reverses may, however, it is hoped, be of service in compelling Government to abandon their nefarious scheme of turning a theatre of this importance into a toy to solace the leisure of leurs excellences the Ministers.

The post, or bureau, of an "agent-de-change"—anglice, stockbroker—was sold in Paris, on Thursday last, for the sum of £48,000 (or 1,200,000 francs), a figure which will give your readers some idea of the development which the business of stock-jobbing has experienced within the last few weeks in Paris. These places, it may not be unnecessary to mention, are here strictly limited by law to a small number; and this restriction it is which makes them so valuable. Notwithstanding the extreme rigidity with which this regulation is ostentatiously acted upon, means have been found to set the law at defiance, and these offices or "charges" as they are here called, are, with few exceptions, in the hands of a number of partners, who do business nominally, as clerks to the principal; in reality, on their own account. The "quarts," and "quintuages" d'agent-de-change—partners holding a fourth or eighth part of the business—have long been recognised in the moneyed world of Paris; but we have now douzaines, seizièmes, and even vingt-quatrièmes—i.e. twelve, sixteen, or twenty-four parties, who club their little fortunes together to purchase a "charge." Nor must these vingt-quatrièmes be despised—for, in these days of speculation, even the twenty-fourth part of the yearly profits of an agent de change yields a very handsome income. As for a huitième, he invariably sports his cab, and has a villa; while a quart ranks among Nabobs of "La Bourse," can afford to patronise the arts and artists and have a vested interest in the figorantes of the ballet. As for the few who reign with "undivided sway," they are the millionnaires of Parisian finance, who, in concurrence with the great capitalists in troublous times, "ride the whirlwind and direct the storm," often making colossal fortunes from the very events that bring down ruin upon thousands.

Our Exhibition programmes are coming out in immense force. Some of the articles are threatening enough—one ingenious Belgian exhibits a piano, which is to be perfect, and is to cost less than five pounds (120 francs). Care les oreilles!

THE OVERLAND MAIL.

ANNEXATION OF THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

New York, Tuesday, Oct. 10.

The Northern Light, which arrived at this port on Sunday evening (the 8th), brings us news from California up to the 16th of September. The State election had just come off, resulting in another defeat of the Presidential party in San Francisco. Where it was scarcely dreamed that the "Know-Nothings" existed at all, they swept the board. So profoundly secret were all their manoeuvres conducted, that the public knew nothing of their intentions, of their candidates, until the morning of the election. Before night, the blow had been struck, and all their candidates were triumphantly elected. We have satisfactory confirmation from the Sandwich Islands of the negotiation of the treaty for their annexation to the United States. The proposal of annexation came originally from the islands. General Pierce received it with favour, and a special messenger was dispatched with the reply to the American commissioner. When the matter was laid before the council of state it was approved by every member except Prince Alexander, the heir apparent, and Paki, a high chief. The stipulations of the treaty of annexation were definitively arranged. The treaty itself was duly signed, and is now in the hands of the American President, awaiting the meeting of Congress, for the ratification of the Senate. It is premature to speak of the consequences which will attend the annexation of the Sandwich Islands to the United States.

Almost the only opposition that will be raised against it will spring from one or two causes: first, it is well known that many of the leading politicians of the south will favour the measure, because they believe that slavery may be introduced into those islands; and if there is the slightest probability of it, it is certain that a large majority of the people of the United States would never give their consent to the annexation. A large number, too, of our wisest and best men contemplate with serious apprehension the establishment of a precedent which would thus be established, of annexing territories and states out of North America. The whole spirit of our government and history is opposed to what is known as the colonial system of Great Britain; but if the Sandwich Islands can, by universal consent, be admitted to our Union, without slavery, probably all opposition on other grounds would be futile. The annexation party has from the beginning always been triumphant. It was so in the case of Louisiana, whose purchase from France doubled the area of the republic; in that of Florida, which gave us that peninsula; in the case of Texas, which involved a war with Mexico. It will be so in the future. Those politicians who are the warmest advocates of the spread of the republic will go heartily for the annexation of the Sandwich Islands, chiefly as they would afford us a most important half-way-house on our road to Japan, whose annexation our manifest destiny statesmen even now regard as highly probable. The immense influence which the possession of those islands would put forth upon our commerce in the Pacific can hardly be exaggerated. It may not be too much to say that, in an important sense, it transfers to our hands the Commercial Sceptre of the Pacific Ocean. Your readers, therefore, may not be astonished, within twelve or eighteen months, to learn that the Sandwich Islands have been admitted as a sovereign state into the Union, or to see his Majesty, the late King, take his seat in the United States Senate. This would almost realise the Utopia of the wildest republican fancy. At all events, the monarchs of Europe must not complain, after they have converted so many republics into kingdoms, if we should begin to transform kingdoms into republics.—Special Correspondent of the Daily News.

AUSTRALIANA.

ARRIVAL OF THE RED JACKET AT LIVERPOOL.

The clipper-ship Red Jacket, Captain Reid, arrived in the Mersey on Sunday week with advices from Melbourne to the 1st of August, having accomplished the trip home in 73½ days, notwithstanding her having lost some time in the ice. It is the quickest passage on record. She made the run out from the Rock Light to the anchorage at Melbourne in 69½ days, and has completed the voyage out and home in 5 months and 11 days—this being the most extraordinary performance ever recorded.

She brings 44,913½ ounces of gold, and 28,270 sovereigns. The Lightning arrived at Port Phillip Heads on the 31st of July.

The Carpentaria and Albatross, from this port, the Ottila and Melina, from London, and the Cairngorm, from the Clyde, had arrived at Melbourne.

The John Banks was intended to leave for London the same day as the Red Jacket, and the Frances Henry and the Ballarat at an early date.

Mr. Smith O'Brien had been presented with a cup of Victoria gold, the proceeds of a public subscription.

It had been resolved, by the committee appointed, to make a house-to-house collection for the relief of the families of soldiers who had been dispatched to the war in the East.

The fitting of a large restaurant with gas excited some interest.

The escorts for the week had brought down 33,327 ounces of gold.

Hobart-town advices of the 25th state that in the Legislative Council, on the 25th of July, several messages were received from the Executive and read a first time. £32,000 had been subscribed for a Hobart-town Gas Company. The Lieutenant-Governor had noticed that, under directions from the Secretary of State, male and female ticket-of-leave holders would be required to serve with good conduct only half the period for which they would have had to serve under previous regulations for a recommendation for a conditional pardon. It is also notified that, under the instructions above referred to, pass-holders who have no offence recorded against them since their arrival in the colony, will be allowed a further deduction of one-fourth of the diminished period of service for a ticket-of-leave.

There were only about 100 men at the Mount William diggings, in the place of 700 to 1,000 formerly. Provisions were exceedingly dear, and £15 had been paid for a bag of flour.

Gold remained at £4 per ounce, and stock was decreasing in consequence of the principal banks purchasing at the diggings.

Exchange.—Banks draw on England at 5 per cent. discount, and negotiable drafts against produce or gold at 3 per cent. discount; local bills at 7 per cent. for 95 days, and 8 per cent. for longer dates. Rates of interest on overdrafts, at all banks, 10 per cent.

There was little change in the labour-market, beyond the fact that the continued influx of emigrants had kept up a good supply of male and female servants. Wages had experienced a slight decline.

SYDNEY, July 13.—Awaiting the news of decided operations at the seat of war in Eastern Europe, financial and commercial operations, both in Sydney and Melbourne, are unusually depressed. The only spirited transactions appear to be in lands, which, when offered for sale by the Government or by private holders, readily obtain high prices. Lands in the vicinity of the railway between Sydney and Parramatta may be valued at from £350 to £500 per acre. The Empire says:—"Trade is depressed. Our markets are so overstocked, and the rates of discount are so high, being 6, 7, and 8 per cent. for bills according to currency, that there is an entire absence of speculation. Goods are being sold by auction at prices which must prove ruinous to the exporter. An impression prevailed that decisive news of a declaration of war would have an immediate effect upon prices, but it failed to do so. If anything, prices are lower now than they were before the arrival of that intelligence."

ANOTHER ARRIVAL.—EXTRAORDINARY PASSAGE OF THE LIGHTNING.

The clipper ship Lightning, Captain J. N. Forbes, which reached Liverpool on Monday Oct. 23, has accomplished one of the finest passages recorded in the history of navigation, having made the run from Melbourne to Liverpool in sixty-three days. The Lightning sailed from Liverpool on the 14th May, thus performing the voyage in upwards of three days less time than the Red Jacket, notwithstanding that she was at anchor in Hobson's Bay for a period of five days more than that vessel. Her run from the Mersey to the Equator occupied twenty-five days, and from the parallel of the Cape to Port Phillip Heads thirty days; indeed, such was the nature of the winds, that the top-gallant-sails never had occasion to be furled during the entire passage, neither was there occasion to reef the top-sails. With the exception of five days, when the ship logged 332, 348, 300, 311, and 329 knots respectively per day, no extraordinary distances were logged. Cape Otway Light was made on the night of the 29th July; Port Phillip Heads on the 30th; and she cast anchor, as above stated, in Hobson's Bay, on the 31st, her run having occupied seventy-seven and a half days mean time. On the 26th of Aug. the mails and passengers being embarked, and everything ready for sea, the anchor was hove up, and the Lightning was taken in tow by the steamer Washington as far as the Heads, which she passed at 4 p.m., a smart north-west breeze blowing at the time, and by noon of the 21st 268 miles were logged, Swan Island Light, Banks's Straits, having been passed at 11 a.m. On the 24th, at 4 a.m., passed a large ship, supposed to be the Mermaid, which sailed two days previously for Liverpool; and at 10 p.m., same day, passed the Auckland Islands. From thence to the 28th, when the ship was in lat. 57.20, south long. 164 W., fresh westerly and south-westerly breezes were experienced, and the ship went nobly along, seldom logging less than 14, and frequently 18½ and 19 knots per hour. At 11 p.m. on the 28th, whilst under a heavy press of canvas, a violent squall from south-west caught the ship, and carried away the foretopmast studding-sail-boom, the foretop, foretopgallant, and foreroyal yards, and blowing all the sails to pieces, and the ship was obliged to go under easy canvas for the succeeding four days, until the yards and sails had been replaced. From the 1st to the 8th of September fine westerly winds were experienced, and the ship averaged close upon 300 miles per day, as per log. On the 8th, at 3 a.m., Cape Horn bore north-west distant 50 miles, being a run of only nineteen days mean time from Port Phillip Heads, by far the fastest ever recorded either under

GOLD FIELDS.

Of the enormous arrivals of gold in England, nothing now remains of them here. Gold and silver are still wanted on the Continent; and whatever might be the amount of the importations into this country, the demand abroad will still be supplied by us, and will keep in check any very great preponderance of supply over our own wants. It will be seen by the following table that, although the importations from all parts this year have been very large, the stock of bullion has not increased; on the contrary, it has decreased. This is so far satisfactory, as it shows how ready a market we find for what would otherwise be a most serious burthen. While the stock of bullion in the bank does not fall below a certain point, there is no cause for uneasiness when we see gold go out as fast as it comes into the country, for we shall do a larger trade, and consequently derive a greater profit.

We have here a total importation of gold into this country, during a period of nine months and a half, of £20,720,000, and a diminution during the same period in the stock of bullion held by the Bank of England of £3,313,679.

MELBOURNE GOLD CIRCULAR, AUGUST 19.

Gold still remains at £4 per ounce in Melbourne, but the price has been falling during the last week at the diggings till it has arrived at 79s. 9d. This has had the effect of bringing a little more gold to Melbourne for sale than we have had for a few weeks past. One of the banks has ceased purchasing for the present; and if the others follow this example, trade in general will be greatly improved, both here and at the diggings. The Arcoea fields are turning out handsomely, nearly 12,000 ounces having arrived by escort, and from Mount William diggings (Maryborough) we have nearly 400 ounces. This, coupled with the fact of over 32,000 ounces as the total gold reported, is exceedingly encouraging in these dull times.

The Chinese question is being brought before the public more forcibly every day, and the question "What are we to do with the Chinese?" is one of considerable anxiety and importance.

GEELONG GOLD CIRCULAR.

There has been no alteration since last circular in the price of gold; it still remains at 81s. to 81s. 3d. The quantity arriving in town by private land is very little.

The diggings generally are reported at present as rather inactive. The unusually dry winter is evidently telling in a very great degree against the general yield of gold. On the Mount Alexander side all the cry is for water. A great many places are named—pieces of ground which have been reserved for winter's diggings—where as yet they cannot get to work. As a general rule our experience as a gold-producing country, as far as it has gone, shows that the rainy season is the best suited for the employment of gold-seeking; while a few places are and can be only wrought in summer, there are treble that number where the water is the desideratum. Our fresh discoveries are made for the most part during the winter. Tarrangower, on the Bendigo quarter, is just now attracting attention; several parties there are making lucky hits.

A great cause of the inconvenience exists in the postal arrangements between this and Ballarat. There are at present but two mails per week, and these so planned that the letters downward are received just two or three hours after the upward mail has been dispatched. The great amount of business doing at the two places certainly warrants now a daily mail, and if it is considered necessary to have an overland mail daily between Melbourne and Geelong, when it is otherwise so well connected by steam, it ought to be considered imperative that the communication between Geelong and Ballarat should be more frequent. On a late occasion we were one entire week without letters from that quarter, one of the bi-weeklies having been omitted, from (we suppose) the rigid adherence of the authorities there to the late fast.

canvas or steam. On the 10th, 11th, and 12th, north-east, east, and south-east winds were experienced, and but moderate distances were logged, the ship having to be frequently tacked to make a fairway course. On the 13th and 14th strong south and south-west winds were experienced, and she ran 351 and 354 miles per day respectively. From the 15th to the 20th light and head winds were met with, and only from six to seven knots per hour was averaged. On the 20th she was in lat. 29.13 S., long. 31.40 W., and from thence to Pernambuco, which port was passed at a distance of six miles, on the morning of the 28th, nothing but light N.E. and N.N.E. winds were experienced. The Equator was crossed at 9 a.m. on the 30th, in lon. 34.30 W., the ship at the time being only but a little over forty days, mean time, from Port Phillip, an extraordinary achievement, considering the adverse winds encountered after rounding Cape Horn. For the first five days after crossing the Equator, light winds and calms were met with, accompanied by heavy torrents of rain, and the ship made little or no progress. On the 5th, in lat. 10 N., lon. 34 W., gentle N.E. trade winds were experienced, which continued until the 10th, in lat. 30 N., lon. 37 W. On the 11th and 12th she had moderate S.E. winds, and at noon of the latter day was in the latitude of St. Michael's, and lon. 30 W., being only 4 months and 29 days out from the time of leaving Liverpool. From the 12th to the 19th the winds were E.N.E. and N.E., very light; and during the intervening seven days the ship reached lat. 46.15 N., lon. 28 W., and at 10 p.m. on the 19th a strong northerly breeze sprang up, which continued until her arrival off the Old Head of Kinsale at 4 a.m. on Sunday. At 10 a.m., off Minehead, signals were exchanged with the Royal Mail steamship Arabia, for New York; at 3.30 p.m. Tasker Light was passed; at 8.30 p.m. Hazyard Light was passed; and at 10.30 p.m. the ship was abreast Point Lynas, where she received a pilot. The ship was kept under easy sail during the night, waiting a sufficiency of water to cross the bar, and arrived in the Mersey at 9.30 on Monday morning, Oct. 23.

By the Lightning we are in possession of advices from Melbourne to the 20th August, Sydney to the 7th, Adelaide to the 3rd, Hobart Town to the 11th, and Lancastonia to the 16th August, inclusive. The Lightning has brought upwards of eighty passengers, and 40,000 ounces of gold-dust on freight, besides a large amount in the hands of passengers.

The Lightning has brought answers to the letters of the 13th June, per Great Britain, making a course of post of only 132 days.

The clipper-ship John Banks sailed from Melbourne for London, on the 15th August, with a large amount of gold-dust on freight.

The screw-steamer Lady Jocelyn, with the mails of the 4th June, from Southampton, arrived in Hobson's Bay on the 12th August.

The screw-steamer Great Britain, which sailed from Liverpool on the 13th June, arrived in Hobson's Bay at two p.m. on the 18th August, and came to anchor, but was afterwards compelled to proceed to Ticonderoga Bay, to perform a rigid quarantine, several cases of small-pox having occurred on board.

The clipper-ship Ballarat was to sail for London, from Melbourne, on the 22nd August.

The clipper-ship Ocean Chief, Captain Tobin, belonging to the Black Ball line, arrived at Port Phillip on the 7th August, after a fine passage of seventy-four days.

The clipper-ship Francis Henry sailed from Melbourne for London on the 17th August, with 33,876 ounces of gold, value £135,504, and 4,400 sovereigns on freight. The Mermaid sailed for Liverpool on the 17th, with 10,000 ounces, value £40,000, in gold-dust, on freight.

During the previous week the gold escorts brought the following amounts—namely, from Mount Alexander and Bendigo, 23,426 ounces, and from Ballarat 4,206 ounces.

The Portland Bay Guardian states that new gold-diggings had been discovered about twelve miles from that town.

Our advices from Hobart Town are to the 15th August. The Gazette of the 11th announces that Sir John L. Pedder had resigned his office as chief justice of the Supreme Court of Van Diemen's Land, on account of impaired health. The appointment of Valentine Fleming, Esq., to the vacancy, and of Francis Smith, Esq., to the attorney-generalship, was also gazetted.

Sir Charles Hotham, the new lieutenant-governor of Victoria, was very popular among all classes of the people.

A meeting of the proprietors of the Wentworth Gold Field Company was held at the office on the 29th of July, at which a report was presented and adopted. Some earth, which was tested, yielded from 23lbs. 2oz. 16 dwts., or at the rate of 272 oz. 14 dwts. to the ton.

The Oriental Bank Company, of which a branch is established in Melbourne, has adopted the practice—new in that town—of allowing interest upon deposit accounts of which the mean daily balance is within the limits of £100 and £10,000. The interest to be allowed is 1½ per cent., except in the case of deposits that require notice of withdrawal.

A report is current that copper has been discovered somewhere in the neighbourhood of Melbourne.

The Legislative Council of South Australia met for the opening of the session on the 2nd of August. The lieutenant-governor read an address, in the course of which he proposed to meet the pecuniary exigencies of the colony by borrowing money. He also suggested that sixteen 32-pounders, which would shortly be sent there, should eventually be distributed amongst the steam-vessels, which, when thus armed, would form an efficient force.

We have received Moreton Bay papers to the 22nd of July. The election for the county of Stanley appeared to be exciting an unusual degree of activity. Both candidates (Mr. Hodgson and Dr. Lang) were before the constituency by requisition.

LORD RAGLAN AND HIS STAFF, after quitting Alma, rode on considerably in advance of the troops, to the great astonishment and indignation of a Prussian officer, who loudly declared such conduct was quite opposed to the rules of war. Fluelen himself could not have been more angry at such disregard of martial etiquette than the gallant gentleman in question, and certainly our chief did show marked contempt for the enemy, and the most superb disdain of his famed Cossacks. The fact was, that 200 cavalry of the smallest enterprise might have cut off my Lord Raglan, his aides, his generals of artillery, and engineers and their staff, his quartermaster-general and his staff, his adjutant-general and his staff, Sir John Burgoyne and his staff, and all the staff doctors, at any time, for hours. However, there was not a trace of the enemy, except that which we found soon afterwards in the houses.

CUTTING TELEGRAPHIC WIRES.—The communications by the telegraph line which connects Elsinore with Hamburg, and the wires of which are under ground, were interrupted on the 24th ult. On the morning of that day it was perceived that the telegraph did not work. An examination was commenced beneath the surface, and it was discovered that in one place the ground had been disturbed very recently. A further prosecution of the investigation showed that all the wires had been cut. The perpetrator of this criminal act was speedily arrested, and proved to be a child twelve years old, the son of a workman residing in an adjacent village. The offender confessed that, to amuse himself, he had dug up the ground with a spade, and had severed the wires with a pair of scissors. He was handed over to the tribunal of police, which condemned him to receive forty-five blows with rods, by three instalments.

RAILWAY CAPITAL AND LOANS.—From a Parliamentary paper recently printed it appears that the total capital and loans which the various railway companies of the united kingdom were authorised by acts of Parliament to raise up to the 31st of December last amounted to no less a sum than £366,769,732. 15s. Of this £274,369,932. 17s. 4d. was by capital, and £92,399,799. 17s. 8d. by loan. The total amount actually raised by the various companies up to the 31st of December last was £273,324,516. 6s. 9d., of which £65,072,958. 12s. 11d. was by loan, and £208,251,557. 13s. 10d. by share capital. Of this last, £164,724,177. 18s. 10d. neither received nor was entitled to receive preferential dividend or interest. The railway companies still retained power at the end of 1853 to raise £91,289,840. 17s., either by existing or new shares, or by loans. The total length of railway open for traffic at the end of 1853 was 7,686 miles 4¼ chains, of which 5,937 miles 2¼ chains were as double lines, and 1,699 miles 2¼ chains as single lines; 883 miles and 60 chains were in course of construction at that time, and 4,079 miles 4¼ chains had been authorised, but had not been commenced.

LOCOMOTIVES FOR AUSTRALIA.—The Ebba Blache of London, for Sydney, has taken on board a number of locomotives, tenders, carriages and waggons, for the Sydney Railway. She loaded in the East India Dock.

NEW YORK, Oct. 3.—We have recently learned that telegraphic experiments have been made at Portsmouth, England, and with perfect success, by which, with an operating battery on one side of a mill dam, 500 feet across, and the corresponding dial on the other side, telegraphic messages were conveyed through the water without the aid of connecting wires; and it is contended that in the same manner a telegraphic message may be sent across the British Channel without continuous cables of wire. The first impression of everybody, after reading this statement, would be that the experiment is new. It is proper to correct the mistake. One hundred and six years ago, Dr. Franklin, the American philosopher, made the same experiment on a larger scale, and with the same success. And nine years ago Professor Morse made successful experiments across the Susquehanna river, and expended a good deal of time and money with the hope of being able ultimately to transmit intelligence in the same way across the Atlantic. In 1748, Dr. Franklin invited his philosophical friends to what he termed an electrical feast, on the shore of the Schuylkill, near Philadelphia, where he tried his experiments. In describing them to his friend, Peter Collinson, of London, he uses the following language:—"Chagrined a little that we have hitherto been able to produce nothing in this way of use to mankind, and the hot weather coming on when electrical experiments are not so agreeable, it is proposed to put an end to them for this season, somewhat humorously, in a party of pleasure on the banks of the Schuylkill. Spirits at the same time are to be fired by a spark sent from side to side through the river without any other conductor than the water; an experiment which we some time since performed to the amazement of many. A turkey is to be killed for our dinner by the electric shock and roasted by the electric jack, before a fire kindled by the electrified bottle, when the health of all the famous electricians of England, Holland, France and Germany are to be drunk in electrified bumpers, under a discharge of guns from the electrical battery."

BOW-STREET.

BURGLARY.—Fitzroy McKeogh and Donald Cameron were charged with burglary at the house of Mr. C. F. Thompson, No. 23, Craven-street, Strand; both of the prisoners were captured in the house, having packed ready for removal nearly £200 worth of property.—Jane Merrigan said: I am servant to Mr. Thompson, and live at his house. I went into the drawing-room on Monday evening about nine o'clock, with a light in my hand; on opening the folding-doors leading to the bedroom, a man pushed them against me. I ran down and told my master, who went up and seized the prisoner McKeogh, and took him down stairs, after which I saw the other prisoner, Cameron, come out of the same room and go down stairs.—Mr. George P. Thompson, said: I live at 23, Craven-street. Last evening, shortly after nine o'clock, the last witness came to me and told me that some man was up in the first-floor. I went up stairs, taking with me a pistol which I had by me, and which was loaded with blank cartridge. I seized the prisoner McKeogh, and, although he resisted violently, I held him firmly and took him down stairs. In the struggle the pistol went off, and slightly hurt his hand. He fell declaring he was shot, but I still held him. At this time the other prisoner, Cameron, came down stairs. I opened the front door, admitted the police, and gave both prisoners into custody. I then went up stairs with an officer. We found the bedroom in the greatest confusion, the boxes, drawers, &c., having been broken open, and property valued at £200, consisting of costly wearing apparel, cash, jewellery, &c., packed up in a counterpane ready for removal. The whole of the property belonged to Lieut.-Col. Ranier, of the 95th Regiment, who occupied the first floor.—Constables A 58 and A 303 proved having taken the prisoners into custody at Mr. Thompson's house, and said that, on searching them at the station, property belonging to Colonel Ranier was found on both of them. A 58 produced a screwdriver which had been found in the room, and which appeared to have been used for breaking open the boxes, &c.—Lieutenant-Colonel Ranier said: I occupy the first floor at 23, Craven-street. I had been from home last evening, and on my return at eleven o'clock, with Mrs. Ranier, I found my bedroom in the state described by Mr. Thompson. The whole of the things packed up were my property.—The prisoners, who declined making any statement, were committed for trial.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.

ASSAULT.—Joseph May, carman, was charged with having assaulted Sir Hedford Wilson, K.C.B.—Sir Hedford Wilson said, he was driving his phaeton, in which were Lady Wilson and child, and, when passing a timber-wagon in Park-lane, one of the horses of the wagon made a snap at one of his horses. He merely flourished his whip at the wagon-horse, hardly doing more than touch the animal, if that; and had hardly gone a half-dozen paces before he received a violent blow from a whip across the shoulders. The whip partly fell on Lady Wilson. He told the servant to get down and to give the defendant into custody.—William Brooks, the groom, said, his master's whip hardly touched the horse in the wagon, upon which the defendant struck his master over the shoulders with his whip.—The defendant said, he had a frolicsome horse, and he was rather angry at seeing it struck by the gentleman. He now humbly begged both the lady and gentleman's pardon.—The complainant remarked, had the defendant said as much at the time, he should not have given him into custody.—Mr. Bingham said, as the defendant had expressed contrition for his conduct, he should fine him in the reduced penalty of £10s.

Our Letter-Bag.

WHIPS AND SPURS.

SIR,—I wrote you a letter some time since, on the above subject, which you were good enough to give a place to in your paper; and as, in it, I expressed a wish that some of the fair sex would favour the public with their convictions, I am glad to see that that wish has been realised by your correspondents "Amy" and "Diana." Every one who reads their contributions to your paper will be convinced that much weight should be attached to their opinions, as they are evidently, from the tone of their epistles, both gentlemen and horsewomen; so that, whilst, on the one hand, they would not forfeit their claim to the former appellation by ill-using a dumb animal, on the other hand, they have sufficient knowledge of equestrianism to be aware that a spur is of use in the management of a horse, and consequently they establish the right of their sex both to wear and to use them when necessary. I highly approve of the man who takes up his pen to caution the fair against the abuse of the power the spur gives them over their horse, but I can't understand how any one should attempt to debar them from the proper use of it. One of your correspondents said it was a beautiful sight to see a gentle girl controlling a spirited and highly-conditioned horse, which it no doubt is; but she couldn't do so, in many instances, unless she has an instrument of punishment like the spur at command.

It is one of the advantages of this discussion in your paper that it has informed all your readers of the softer sex that the spur is an instrument of punishment, and that, if applied with a will, it does cause the object of it severe pain; but this is no reason why a lady should not wear it, and use it; it is only a reason (and a very sufficient one) why she should not use it without cause. Very often the slightest touch, to let the horse know that his rider wears a spur, is sufficient to make him do all that can be, with propriety, asked of him; and in these cases a gentle lady would give her stud no more than a warning; but if he is really obstinate, or determinedly lazy, by all means let her give him a real taste of the persuaders, till he submits to her will. I know women are accused of loving power, and, in some instances, I don't approve of seeing their wishes indulged, as, for instance, "when the grey mare is the better horse," but when she is placed in the saddle I would invest her with absolute power, and to have that dominion should be entrusted with suitable instruments of punishment. She must have her whip and spur capable of inflicting severe pain if required; and I feel sure that most ladies, when made aware, by publications such as have appeared in your paper, that the whip and spur do cause much pain, will only use them when the case justifies their application. I hope I may earn some gratitude from the fair, as a defender of the rights of woman. I love horses nearly as much as I do them, so I am anxious to do something for both; to caution the former against ill-treating the latter, but at the same time to vindicate their right to administer chastisement more or less severe as the case requires. I would have ladies put on their spur as they do their habit, and to learn not to use it merely because they wear it, but to keep it perfectly quiescent till occasion justifies them in bringing it into play.—Your obedient servant, JUSTES.

GUNS.

SIR,—There is a good deal of point and fun, and a great deal of truth, in the letter of your correspondent, "An Old Sportsman and Gun-maker;" but it is rather too personal, and is calculated to give pain. It is evident that he, J. L., and Mr. Bishop, are all of one trade, and that they verify the old adage, that "three of a trade can never agree," or be over-anxious with each other. Mr. Bishop has been a very useful, though perhaps an eccentric, man; and the sporting world must not suffer him to be ridiculed. I agree with your correspondent that learning to shoot by book is quite impossible; but I know that a great many useful hints on shooting, the results of experience, are just as useful when communicated by book as when given orally. I once offered to lend a neighbouring gardener a number of the "Cottage Gardener," wherein he would see the mode of cultivation of a certain plant treated upon. He thanked me, but said, "there was no good in book gardening." I agreed with him that books alone would not make a gardener, but said that that were a pleasant and useful aid to the science; and I urged that it was the same thing whether another gardener told him by word of mouth of some new and useful discovery, or whether he told him by letter, or letter-press.

He must be a bold man who holds book-learning too cheaply at the present day. I never read THE FIELD, or any other newspaper, without deriving some amusement and some instruction from the perusal.—Yours, &c., UXDRA.

FERRETS.

SIR,—In your last week's paper is an inquiry from a correspondent, as to some practical work on the "Ferret." Some time ago, I wrote two letters to you on the subject, which appeared in your second volume, pages 561 and 632. I know of no work that gives a fuller account of them; but, if there are any other questions he would ask, if he will transmit them to you, with his address, I will send him a private letter.

He also says they are most delicate animals. There I beg to differ, for, at the close of this breeding season, I can say, as I did before, "I have never lost one from disease;" and, I believe, it is owing to keeping them warm (not hot), clean, and dry. To do so is very simple; and I have given my plan in the letters before referred to. My breed, too, is white, which is considered the most delicate, and through the last severe winter they were kept in a dry room, the window of which was only quite closed on the very coldest nights.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

THE HISTORY OF FREEMASONRY.

Of a revolution so fatal to the fine arts there is little danger. The standard of taste in architecture, fostered and encouraged by civilisation and peace, has been effectually set up. The caprice of the few cannot overpower the influence of the many. Nor is it likely to be lost till the same darkness, which once overspread ancient Greece and Rome, shall involve all modern Europe—an event too improbable to be apprehended but by the gloomy visionary.

The history of Freemasonry in Great Britain commences about the year 287, when Dioctian, and Maximilian, Joint Emperors, sent their admiral, Carausius, against the Saxon pirates, who, on account of the peace with the Picts, had gained a formidable victory; wherefore, he was made Emperor of the British Isle, and being a lover of the arts, appointed Albanus Master Mason, who built the palace of St. Alban, and fortified the town of that name.

St. Alban was not only the best Master Mason in Great Britain, but he was the first man who suffered martyrdom, being beheaded in a general persecution of the early Christians. In 303, the Empress Helena girt the City of London with a stone wall; and after this period Masonry began to be encouraged; but, in 584, a horrid period was put to the progress of architecture, by Hengist, King of Kent, who, in his bloody congress, murdered 300 British nobles, many of them great artists and encouragers of Masonry. Pope Gregory I., who was a great encourager of the art, sent Augustine and a colony of monks into Britain, who converted Ethelbert, King of Kent, and, in return, made the first Bishop of Canterbury, the Cathedral of which was first built in 600; in 602, the Cathedral of Rochester; in 604, the Cathedral of London; and, in 665, the Cathedral of Winchester; four cathedrals in the short period of five years. The clergy, at this time, made architecture their study, and the Mason Lodges, or Assemblies, were usually held in the monasteries. In 680, Bennet, Abbot of Wirral, first introduced stone and brick; formerly, wood was the chief material. Many of our ancient worthies filled the Masonic chair in succession. In 857, St. Swithin was Grand Master; in 957, St. Dunstan filled that office. Several of the Bishops of Exeter, the famous William of Wykeham, Bishop of Winchester; Chicheley, Archbishop of Canterbury; Wainfleet, Bishop of Winchester; Beauchamp, Bishop of Salisbury; Cardinal Wolsey, and many other dignitaries, were all Master Masons.

SIR BULWER LYTTON'S CHEAP EDITIONS.

To the Editor of THE FIELD.

SIR,—We have great satisfaction in laying before the public the following letter from Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, which, it will be seen, entirely contradicts the assertion put forward by Messrs. S. Low and Co., that the agreement existing with that eminent author has been rescinded.

We are, &c.,

G. ROUTLEDGE and Co.

2, Farringdon-street, Oct. 23.

"Knobworth, October 21st, 1851.

"DEAR SIR,—I was as much surprised as yourself by the paragraph in the Publishers' Circular. Certainly there has never been, on either side, a suggestion to rescind our engagement, nor the least hesitation on your part as to the fulfilment of the contract you have hitherto carried out with equal liberality and honour. You say truly that the circulation of the popular edition of my works is equal to the expectations formed when we discussed the subject. And it affords me sincere pleasure to learn that you see no cause to apprehend that the ultimate results will leave you a loser by your spirited reliance on the increase of the reading public, and the steady and progressive demand of cheap literature, which is so distinguishing an attribute of our age.

Yours truly,

"E. BULWER LYTTON.

Houses with the Fronts Off. By HAIN FRISWELL. Illustrated by Wm. McConnell. James Blackwood, Lovell's-court, Paternoster-row.

Among the shoals of shilling volumes with which we have of late been inundated, the present book stands pre-eminently forth, for its originality, and for the healthy and vigorous style in which it is written. The author's purpose seems to have been the production of a work which should be something more than a mere kill-time. In carrying out this intention he has been eminently successful; for, while "Houses with the Fronts Off" will be found an amusing companion, it will also be found to contain much information and wholesome food for reflection. But we will let the author speak for himself, taking for a specimen the opening sketch, "The House in Chancery."

There were three of us houses, who fell into this misfortune together: myself, No. 2 next door, and No. 21 further up the street. The old woman who came to births and christenings, and sometimes to deaths and layings-out, which took place in the days of our prosperity, said we were unlucky numbers; from our present state I imagine they were right.

Our owner, one Jared Stares, was an old gentleman who fancied that he was forgotten unless he was the talk of the neighbourhood, and in pursuance of his plan of filling everybody's mouth, got into innumerable squabbles with his relatives; he never was at peace with one branch of his family but he quarrelled with the others; he patronised some of the lower members merely to flout and insult the higher; but as he was a rich man, he had them always about him, and lived in great glory and to his own enjoyment, being, as he called, the principal source of conversation and contention amongst his relations. Thus in this world we arrive by perseverance at our own ruin, even against that which good men would imagine to be the will of Providence; and praying for our own ill, are often cursed with our wishes. I beg pardon for this moral, but I am in Chancery—poor, out of paint, rather out of windows, and as sentimental as a natural consequence.

At last Jared Stares died, and determining to fill other men's mouths still, left a will, wherein we were devised to "William Peterson," a person upon whose identity the lawyers have not yet determined; one batch of gentlemen, with whom is Temple Lane, Esq., Q.C., declaring that we are the property of William, the son of Peter Stares, and grandson of Jared aforesaid; and the other, whose mouth-piece is Sergeant Littleton Noy, declaring that we belong to William Peterson, a nephew of Jared.

That is how we came into Chancery.

After relating how our Joshua Eels got possession of the key surreptitiously, and came to live in the house, we are told that:—

Joshua Eels had also a wife; such a poor, scared, slatternly, over-worked thing, with a mind pre-occupied in gathering up the threads of yesterday's labour, or in trying to understand how last year's misfortune fell upon them. She boasted of what she called a Scripture name, as well as Joshua—it was Patience! Heaven bless her! A poor, meek, worn-out Christian! Patience too! fighting for ever against the thick-falling ill, not trying to overcome them; but endeavouring to push them by, half-dressed, to like her children; so that they had accumulated so greatly, that Patience Eels lived at the time I am speaking of, at least three years behind her time of life; and sometimes awakening with a frantic plunge, like some half-bruising creature, and battling desperately against the stream, till she found it too strong for her, and so lay still and got borne back again to her old place.

As for Joshua, good soul, he was a careless and half-industrious fellow, but a fatalist; he had fallen, had his goods seized, and thought it no use to try, and so he did not. By the time he took up his residence in me, he had also grafted on to his character a very fair portion of the rogue—the good-natured rogue, who might bamboozle you a dozen times, without, unless you were particularly sharp, destroying your faith in him, he seemed so earnest and so helpless. He confessed that he took me to avoid paying rent, and hiding after he had retained in quiet possession for six months that he was benighted thereby, he made what he was pleased to call a "splash," bought some little furniture himself, and took in some lodgers, who brought their furniture too.

But other people were as cunning as Joshua Eels; and the various laquays finding that Joshua in his pride had even put a new coat of paint on his door, wherefrom the larks of his progeny basking in the sun had worn it, and that the rooms had something in them to selze, waited for another six months, and no longer threatening him separately, joined issue and came full sweep upon Joshua, and his tenants' goods, and having ejected the one and seized the others, retired in great triumph. They were my last tenants, at least in open day; it got buzzed about that I was in Chancery; my shutters were shut up, and boys began to take liberties with me; no second Joshua Eels has had the boldness to take me.

I have said that the boys took liberties with me; first by knocking single raps at my door and running away, then more boldly by thundering double knocks, and causing such annoyance to the street, that one venturesome and nervous old gentleman sallied out boldly one morning, and threw a strong stick which fastened my iron tongue down for ever; no, not for ever—I hope not, though I am grown fondly and hypocritically.

This did not defeat my old enemies, the boys; they recommenced attacks by pitching stones down my area, and endeavouring to helge them on the sill of the kitchen window, then upon those of the drawing-room; till at last, by long endeavours bolder grown, they mustered in great force, and courage being given to numbers, sent such a volley through my windows as left but a few panes whole in me. Those which have escaped the stones are begrimed with smoke and dirt, but inside I fare worse.

Rats run through my drains and breed in glory in my sinks, and mice by hundreds have taken possession of my cupboards; the wind which sweeps through the crevices of my shutters plays deadly fiddle tunes on the rollers which hang in festoons; but the spiders which spin them do not grow fat, for I am far too lonely for a decent fly to buzz in. My kitchens are uninhabited save by houseless cats, and long, dark, London-bred neets, which have lost their colour and their spirits long ago.

But my drawing-room shows chiefly my decay. I have noted down somewhere, an observation which a witty fellow made at a dinner-party which took place in me some years ago. The question occurred as to which part of his dress pointed out the fallen man first. The one said his hat, which was always as well worn and so carefully brushed; and another, his rusty and buttoned coat; a third inclined to the fact of his wearing bladders instead of Wellingtons; and a fourth told such a one by his gloves. But the fifth, a wit, who had had his observation sharpened by having been in the same situation himself, said, "Gentlemen, you must look deeper; I tell a fallen man by his linen—if he have any." So I would look deeper than the paintless door and blistered railings, and look to the drawing-rooms of such houses as myself.

I had not been long in this state, when my attics, which had suffered considerably from the rain, were entered upon one night, and dwelt in for some time by two men. These had a quantity of casts of plaster of Paris with them, and when with me seemed to be so fond of the Queen's countenance, that they were for ever taking impressions (in plaster) off a new half-crown. Huddled up to the fire-place—a miserable place it was; for although I once boasted of bright steel and ornate in the drawing-rooms, I was not particularly well set off in places destined only for lumber and servants—they would sit for hours over a long table, feeling the fire cautiously from time to time, till the metal at the top grew motive with heat, and seemed to beat itself, would part the gathering dress and show a vein as bright as silver. They would then as carefully pour it out into these little casts, and waiting till it was cold, take out brilliant new coins, which they would, after testing, proceed to rub with cloth and oil, and otherwise deface till they had acquired the look of age and of circulation.

Poor wretches! The anxiety which they experienced when, having passed these to their associates, they waited for the fruits of their labours, might make me pity them.

The time came at last. One morning when the colliers were asleep, some officers of a certain regiment—the blues—who carry no swords, but bulge in iron-skin capes and dark lanterns, entered my kitchen by the area, and staying for nothing passed quickly and silently up stairs, where they lay concealed till night came round again, and the owners had begun their work. No sooner were the bright little coins taken from the plaster than a sudden rush was made, and my two tenants very skillfully captured, with evidence enough against them to convict a regiment. The officers then retired with their prisoners, leaving me in chaos.

Then it was that turning on his dark lantern, the said officer wandered through all my deserted rooms; and sometimes started by two rats, came down the stairs from attic to kitchen—down the stairs from room to room, peering into empty cupboards, and making the gilt moulding, which dropped from the corners of my drawing-room, wink and glitter on each shroud of gold.

Down stairs still, to the dining-room, where the damp ran down its painted walls, and the rats made doleful noises behind the skirting.

Down stairs again, to where the round hole in the kitchen-shutter let in a ray of light upon some dark heap of clothes which lay huddled upon the blackened and deserted hearth, and like a man—no, worse yet a woman; yet let the lantern shine a moment, and the form grows familiar to the eye. Yes, there alone—here children in the workhouse, and her husband driven to some roguery above his mark and expiating his failure in a jail—His Patience Eels—patient enough now, Heaven knows.

Twist off a shutter, officer, from the rusty hinge, or have a stretcher brought. Soon do—And next at the station-house door paste up another placard of "FOCUS DRAY."

Enough! I've said my say, and am unused to talking, and so melancholy that a funeral, which once used to shut up my shutters entirely, would make me feel quite gay now. Gay! as if a house in Chancery could be so; I am dying.

The very boys run frightened past me and seem to know that "Something ails me now;

The place is cursed;" and, like Yorick's skull, more than twenty times a day, I hear the lads of one song—"In Chancery!" IN CHANCERY!! IN CHANCERY!!!

Watkins's London Directory for 1855.

Mr. Watkins has just issued his fourth Directory for the use of the metropolitan public, and the volume, like that of its other contemporary, published by the Messrs. Kelly, is swelling palpably in bodily substance. There seems to be no lack of the energy necessary to ensure completeness, and we notice in the present publication several new features of great service to those who have occasion to refer to these manuals. The directories are not only as numerous as they have hitherto been, but they contain certain subdivisions and summaries, well calculated to facilitate a doubtful search. The directory of the environs of London, both as concerns tradesmen and gentry, is a welcome novelty, and is very properly included in a volume which professes to pourtray, in every form of development and detail, the personal contents of the capital of the world. The vigilance of the editors requires to be of the most rapid and practical kind. The volume includes such recent facts as the promotion of Lord Burghersh and the death of the Earl of Abingdon. But the editorial activity is visible throughout, and the directory, in its aggregate sense, evinces a manifest improvement upon its predecessors. Of its general accuracy we are unable to speak, excepting as regards the few tests to which we have submitted it; but we conclude that so essential a characteristic has received due attention. The volume comprises nearly 2500 pages, a considerable increase upon the number of pages last year; and the same contrivance is resorted to for opening the precise directory which may be required. In a multitude of separate alphabets, the latter is a convenience of no small moment, besides being an economisation of time. "Watkins's Directory," in a word, is now fairly in the field. The proprietors are both industrious and enterprising; and the production of a fourth volume, enlarged in all its branches, at least implies that it has met with an encouraging measure of patronage.

FINE ARTS.

ON NATIONAL MONUMENTS.—After the two enormous and gigantic public monuments of the late Duke of Wellington, and those too elevated of Nelson and the Duke of York, surely it is but fair that the British people should show their gratitude towards the other heroes of the late war by similar testimonies of respect. The names of Hill, Beresford, Anglesey, and others, as they leave the world, should be perpetuated to posterity—for their achievements were no less brilliant on the plains of Waterloo than their chief in command—or their renown will in a very few years be only remembered by those who can read of their historical deeds in books. We are led to this feeling from having just been introduced to view a model of a proposed equestrian statue of the late gallant Marquis of Anglesey, by Mr. Carleton McCarthy, the sculptor. We have much pleasure in testifying to its great merit. The figure, in the costume of the Hussars, is excellently designed, and the expression of the likeness is most striking; and the horse we pronounce perfect in contour and action.

BOOKS FOR THE CRIMEA.—The officers before Sebastopol are calling for books, finding that the Turkish and Tatar languages are amazingly similar; and among those most desired is "Knight's Pocket Vocabulary;" but, unfortunately, not a single bookseller remains in Balaklava.

J. LANG has an extensive assortment of Second-hand GUNS, by all the first London Makers, at half their original cost, which he has taken in exchange, in addition to his own superior GUNS and RIFLES, as turned out by the late Joseph Manton, for the superior finish of which J. Lang obtained a prize medal at the Great Exhibition. Rifles on the most approved plan for the Conical Ball, for Deer-shooting or long distances. Revolving Pistols on J. Lang's own plan, as also Dean and Adams', Colt's, &c.; but a trial is recommended before risking money or life.

TO SPORTSMEN.—Her Majesty's

Royal Letters Patent, for valuable and extraordinary improvements in the most powerful and brilliant Telescopes, Camp, Opera, Race-course, and Perspective Glasses, to know the distances of objects viewed through them—of great importance to Sportsmen, the Army, Navy, and others. Messrs. S. and B. SOLOMONS, Opticians, 39, Albemarle-street, Piccadilly. Observe—Opposite the York Hotel. These Telescopes possess such extraordinary powers, that some three-and-a-half inches with an extra eye-piece will show distinctly Jupiter's moons, Saturn's ring, and the double stars. With the same Telescope can be seen a person's countenance three-and-a-half miles distant, and an object from sixteen to twenty miles. They are of larger, and still sizes, with increasing powers accordingly.

THE ROYAL EXHIBITION, 1851.—A valuable, newly-invented, very small powerful water-proof pocket glass, the size of a walnut, by which a person can be seen and known one-and-a-half miles distant. They answer every purpose on the race-course, at the opera-house, country scenery, and ships are clearly seen at twelve to fourteen miles. They are invaluable for shooting, deer-stalking, yachting, to sportsmen, gentlemen, game-keepers, and tourists. Opera and Race-course Perspective Glasses, with wonderful powers; an object can be clearly seen from ten to twelve miles distant. Newly-invented Spectacles. The most aged defective sight is brought to its youthful, natural, and original state. Invisible and all kinds of Acoustic Instruments for relief of extreme Deafness.—39, Albemarle-street, Piccadilly, opposite the York Hotel.

TWO YEARS' TRAVEL IN AFRICA.

A correspondent of her Majesty's ship Pluto writes to the Athenaeum, under date, Fernando, July 25:—

"We have had a most exciting cruise. After leaving this place, and communicating with the senior officer at Louisa, we were sent up the river Congo to settle a dispute between the master of an English merchant brig and some Portuguese. After this was arranged, we returned to Louisa for our letters, but the Polydemos not arriving in time, the ship sailed again for the Congo, and I was left behind in one of our gigs, with four kroomen, for the mail. During our stay, I met, at the house of one of the commissioners, one of the most extraordinary men I have ever seen, Dr. Livingston; he has just arrived from the Cape overland, a most arduous undertaking, and one never accomplished before, although often attempted. His plan of proceeding differed materially from any of his predecessors; instead of setting out with half a hundred attendants, horses, bullock waggons, &c., he commenced his journey, carrying with him only a sextant, gun, chronometer, tent, four servants, and as many days' provisions, relying on Providence and his gun for a supply when these were gone. After leaving the Cape colony, he was obliged to travel a long way to the north-east in order to avoid the deserts and hostile tribes in their vicinity that lay on their left; crossing in this route a great many branches of the river Zambezi and others, the names of which I have forgotten, till he arrived at a large town. There, as the chief was very hospitable, he remained a short time to recruit his health, having been nearly drowned and starved half a dozen times during the nine months it took him to perform this part of his journey, and his arm badly broken in two places by a lion. It appeared he had wandered one evening from his attendants, after they had pitched their tent, in quest of game, when he came suddenly on a large lion crouching down ready for a spring at him; without waiting a second he fired, and must have been knocked down at the same moment and stunned, as he remembers nothing from the time he fired till he was found by his servants next morning; when they came up they found the doctor insensible and the lion lying dead alongside him. When he left, the chief, who was very desirous of finding a route to the westward for the transmission of his ivory, gave him twenty-four of his people to assist him on his journey. After leaving, he again travelled to the N.E., until he arrived in the parallel of Louisa. Now came the tug of war. He had upwards of a thousand miles to travel across the unexplored countries of our charts, a tract never hitherto trodden by any white man, and wholly unknown even to the blacks he had seen as yet; however, this part of their journey proved to be the easiest, and it was not till he arrived near Cas-anga, on the Portuguese frontier, that he met with any molestation. The country he found to be thickly populated, and the inhabitants very peaceably disposed. From their never having seen a white man before, you may fancy what an object of curiosity he became to them; wherever he stopped, the people from far and near flocked round him with the utmost astonishment pictured on their countenances. As the doctor was very much sunburnt, his colour did not so much surprise them as his hair, which was very long; this was the great object of attraction wherever he went, and highly favoured did those fancy themselves who became the possessors of a lock of it. Every tribe he met with had some idea of one Supreme Being and a future state of existence, though they all worship, in addition, various animals that they hold sacred. At every place he stopped they supplied him liberally with provisions, and it was not, as I mentioned before, till he arrived near the Portuguese territories that he met with any trouble. There the inhabitants have been in the habit of kidnapping the people further inland, to sell to the Portuguese for slaves, and fearing, should the road be opened that way, it would spoil their traffic, they became very troublesome and wanted the doctor to pay toll nearly every step he took; however, by putting on a bold front, he managed to make his way through, and arrived at Louisa safely in the beginning of June, making it exactly two years since he left the Cape. The doctor is very much emaciated from the hardships he has undergone, and has not recovered the use of his arm perfectly yet; but as soon as he is well he is determined to return, trying this time to find a shorter road than the one he came by. We had the whole of his attendants on board, and showed them over the ship; having never seen salt water before, or anything aloft larger than a canoe, they were very much surprised and delighted, though they told the doctor they would never be able to get any of their people to believe them on their return, so perfectly astonishing did everything appear to them.

LYNCH LAW IN SAN ANTONIO.—For some time past the people residing in Contra Costa, and all that section of the country, have suffered much from the depredations of cattle thieves, and so great has become the audacity of those who engaged in this nefarious business that it was no unusual thing to have whole herds of cattle driven off in one night. The working cattle, milch cows, and fat bullocks of the farmers were being constantly stolen, and as they had learnt by experience that very little protection might be expected from the laws, they determined to take the matter in hand themselves, and make an example for the first cattle thief who might be caught in the act. About four months ago no less than 87 head of cattle were driven off in one night, and 27 of them were tracked to a "corral" near Oakland. A watch was set and the thieves were arrested, brought to trial, and sentenced to two years in the state prison; but one of the parties was soon afterwards pardoned by the interposition of the executive clemency, exercised so often with discernment. It is a notorious fact that a large portion of the beef, sent over here from Oakland is stolen beef, and a few days ago a quantity was shipped on one of the ferry-boats at Oakland, but it had scarcely been stowed away when an officer came on board and informed the captain that it was stolen. The boat was about starting, and the captain said that he would not allow the beef to be delivered in San Francisco, but would bring it back. Suspicion was excited, and the keeper of the toll-bridge near Clinton, with three or four other men, proceeded to a slaughter-house which had long been supposed to be the head-quarters of the cattle-thieves, and, hiding themselves, watched to see what would transpire. This was on Monday night. They had not remained long when five head of cattle were driven in, slaughtered, and their hides buried. They then rushed in and arrested the persons, who proved to be two Frenchmen, named Amadere Carenne and Peter Anghambault, who had long been suspected as the chief cattle-stealers in the neighbourhood. They brought them over to San Antonio, together with the two butchers at whose place the cattle were slaughtered, and delivered them over to the civil authorities there. They were confined at Wetherby's, and during the whole of that evening considerable excitement prevailed. Early on Wednesday morning a party numbering some forty or fifty came down from the Redwoods, and brought out the prisoners and tried them. The proof of their guilt was positive, and sentence of death was pronounced upon them. The two butchers who were arrested at the same time were, however, let loose, as the evidence was not strong enough to convict them as principals, it appearing that they only acted as hired assistants. Carenne and Anghambault were brought out to a tree near the house, lassos were thrown around their necks, and they were strung up to one of the trees. While preparing for the execution, a small party of Frenchmen came down, for the purpose, it was supposed, of rescuing Carenne; but a line was marked out, and those who ordered the execution announced that the first man who should step inside of it should be shot down. The feet of one of the persons who was hung were not more than six inches from the ground. Carenne was reputed to be a wealthy man. His wife keeps the Hotel de France, near San Antonio, and is, besides, the owner of considerable property. It is said that she came forward on Tuesday night and offered large sums of money for the release of her husband. At one o'clock yesterday the bodies were dangling from the tree.—San Francisco Herald.

WATER POISONED

BY LEADEN
PIPES.

"The above engraving represents accurately a section of a leaden pipe, which was employed for a short time in conveying water from a well on the grounds of Mr. Luc, of Bouchurch, Isle of Wight. The original section of pipe is 8 1/2 in. long, 2 1/2 in. diameter, and 5-16 in. thick. A great part of the internal surface is corroded by the action of the water, but as shown in the drawing, four deep excavations have been made, and another is shaded out of view by the manner in which the section of the pipe has been cut. The water has cut these deep pits almost through the pipe, and not only upon the portion which we have illustrated, but have formed similar chasms throughout the entire length."—Expositor.

N.B.—The corrosive water of the Isle of Wight has no effect on Gutta Percha Tubing. See Testimonial below.

TO PROFESSOR HOLLOWAY.
"Sir, I suffered for a considerable period from a severe attack of erysipelas, which at length settled in my leg, and resisted all medical treatment. My sufferings were very great, and I quite despair of any permanent amendment, when I was advised to have recourse to your ointment and pills. I did so without delay, and am happy to say the result was eminently successful, for the effected a radical cure of my leg, and restored me to the enjoyment of health. I shall ever speak with the utmost confidence of your medicines, and have recommended them to others in this neighbourhood similarly afflicted, who derived equal benefit."

I am, Sir, your obliged and faithful servant,

THE FIELD OF WAR.

MAILS FOR SCUTARI HOSPITAL.

On Tuesday, the 24th of October instant, the Postmaster-General issued orders for a separate bag to be made up with letters and newspapers addressed to the invalids and wounded of the British army in Turkey; and, in order that no delay may take place in their delivery, all such, instead of being addressed "Head-quarters," should bear the superscription, "The Hospital, Scutari, Constantinople." These mails will be dispatched on the evenings of the 3rd, 9th, 19th, 23rd, and 29th, or, when the month has 31 days, on the 30th. The postage must be paid in advance. The next mail will be made up on Monday, the day after to-morrow. The additional medical staff for the army in Turkey has already left the Metropolis, to proceed to Constantinople, via Marseilles, where they embark on board the Vectis. The total number of medical men who go out in this ship is thirty. Among them are Dr. Spence and Dr. Cunningham, Inspectors-General of Hospitals, and ten staff-surgeons. Miss Nightingale, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Bracebridge, and thirty-four trained nurses also go by the Vectis to attend on the sick and wounded at Scutari.

"JACK ASHORE" AT SEBASTOPOL.

There certainly never was a siege in the course of which such heavy guns were used on both sides. The English siege train comprises about thirty-eight 32-pounders, thirty 56-pounders, thirty 68-pounders, eighteen 84-pounders, and about a dozen 12 and 13-inch mortars, with six Lancaster guns throwing 96-pound solid shot. H.M.S. Terrible and Retribution have each landed four 68-pounders of 113 cwt., and having a range of from 3,800 to 4,000 yards. Trafalgar, Sanspareil, and Diamond have also landed some of their heaviest metal, and two long-range Lancaster guns have been landed from the gun-boat Arrow, and two from the Beagle, which recently arrived from England. There is no possible combination of which stone and mortar is capable that can resist the concentrated action of such guns as these. The Russians however, are not deficient either in range or weight of metal; some of the finest and heaviest guns used in modern warfare will be found in the fortresses of Sebastopol.

The working of the heavy siege train at first presented a slight difficulty to our commanders. The troops of the line know less than nothing of their management, and even our best artillerymen would be somewhat at sea in conducting for the first time artillery of such heavy calibre. To meet the difficulty, 150 sailors were drawn from each English three-decker, and 100 from each two-decker, and formed into a division about 1,200 strong, divided into two brigades of 600 each, officers and men. The division is placed under the charge of Captain Lushington, of H.M.S. Albion, and each brigade commanded by Captain Moorsom and Captain Peel, of H.M.S. Diamond. "Jack" seemed highly delighted at the prospect of serving ashore at the siege, and, girded with his revolver and cutlass, took up his quarters in the tents on land with as much sans froid as if it was his natural sphere of action. Soon, however, the native jollity of the tars broke out, and uproarious singing was kept up in their different tents until near midnight. A plain ordnance tent, without decorations to distinguish it from those of the "sojers," is far too unassuming an abode for them under their present altered circumstances. Accordingly, the decorative abilities of Tom and Bill having been called into requisition, the canvas is covered with rather bold attempts at ornamentation placed round sundry sentences written over the doors expressive of the amiable intentions of the occupants towards Russians in general. One set of tents are the "Sinop Revenge," another, "Revenge for the Tiger," while a little lower down you come upon 150 hairy muscular strapping fellows, who, if you believe their own inscription, are the "Trafalgar's Lads," or the "Bellerophon's Doves," or some other part of the ship's company, equally mild and inoffensive. The way these fellows have got up the ships' guns is perfectly astonishing. An iron gun, 11 feet long and weighing 113 cwt., seemed nothing to them. They volunteered to lift it along, and they literally did so, tying ropes to its stand, and dragging it by their force over the hills. "I have seen," says the special correspondent of the Morning Herald, "fourteen horses and all the apparatus of the artillery barely moving a gun which fifty sailors have dragged after them at a trot." The Russians will get such melancholy proofs of the superiority of our marine artillery during the siege as they will never forget. They would not meet our vessels before they tried our gunnery—what will they do afterwards? Every one expects the tars to do their duty in a noble manner during the siege. All that is to be feared of them is their over courage.

BALAKLAVA, Sunday, Oct. 8.—The French opened a fire upon Sebastopol two days ago. A three-decker (they say the Twelve Apostles) is careened over as much as possible, and is troublesome; and a gun-boat, with heavy guns, is also disposed to be annoying. It is said that the first step was to destroy these vessels at a long range. The Twelve Apostles is a fine ship, built on the same lines as the English Queen. Seven large Russian ships of war (almost, or perhaps all, line-of-battle ships) have been sunk at the entrance of the harbour, a small channel being left close to the north side. I could only see three line-of-battle ships the other day. Seventeen howitzers have been landed from our fleet, and are to be posted on the heights, and the English pieces altogether will number on the land side about 150. The Terrible has landed four 68-pounders, and the Beagle (gun-boat) yesterday sent her two heavy Lancaster guns on shore. The French are also landing ships' guns.

The luxuries of life (says the special correspondent of the Morning Chronicle) are quite unknown now in the British army in the Crimea. "I wish," said a Guardsman, worth £8,000 a year, to me, "that the Sinooom would come up, for I've not had a clean shirt for a fortnight." The transports realise fabulous prices, and, I am sorry to say, in too many instances make a market of the necessities of the army. Two pounds for a cheese, and 7s. a bottle for brandy, are common prices. Candles, too, and tobacco, are in great request, especially the latter. "Please to let me on board," cried a sergeant alongside of one of our men-of-war steamers, "I'm the purser's cousin." On being admitted, he at once begged pardon for the assertion; "but sure," said he, "I knew you wouldn't let me come in unless I belonged to somebody; and the boys are all wanting so much a bit of tobacco." I need not say he went off with enough to last him for many a day. Our allies, however, are worse off than ourselves. Bread and onions picked up in the fields were their only food for two days; and I believe the officers of some of our steamers had never a pleasanter task than dining one or two among the French officers who had extended their forage as far as Balaklava.

CAMP BEFORE SEBASTOPOL, Oct. 6.—An immense amount of gunpowder, shot, and shell, has been carried up from Balaklava to the lines, and is placed in park and reserve ready for use; but there are many guns landed for which we have no present use, and large numbers of heavy pieces, and quantities of ammunition and ball, remain in the town magazines or in the field magazines along the road. Jack has been of essential service in this hard work. The only thing against him is that he is too strong. He pulls strong carts to pieces as if they were toys. He piles up shot-cases in the ammunition-waggons till the horses fall under the weight, for he cannot understand "the ship starting till the hold is full." He takes long pulls and strong pulls at tow ropes till they give like sewing silk, and he is indefatigable in "rousing" crazy old vehicles up hill, and running full speed with them down hill till they fall to pieces. Many a heap of shot or shell by the road-side marks the scenes of such disasters; but "Jack's" good-humour during this "spree on shore" is inexhaustible, and he comes back for the massive cargo from the camp with the greatest willingness, when he is told it must be got up ere nightfall. It is most cheering to meet a set of these jolly fellows "working up a gun to the camp." They are splendid fellows at this work, which is a pleasure and not a toil to them, and their merry songs, as they drag and strain at the ropes, cheer the ear of the passer-by contrasted with the silence of our troops and artillerymen. They have a camp full of quaint names—"Albion's Pets," "Tiger's Revenge," "Rule Britannia," and such terms, being marked on the tents, which are pitched on the side of a pleasant hill near the town. The naval officers are very active. Captain Peel has landed the heaviest guns of the Diamond, proprio motu; and Captain McCleverty has contributed some fine specimens of heavy metal—68's from the Terrible. To move these up, puts "Jack" in his glory. From a distance you hear some hearty English chorus borne on the breeze over the hill side. As you approach, the strains of an unmistakable Gosport fiddle, mingled with the squeaks of a marine fife, rise up through the unaccustomed vales of the Crimea. A cloud of dust on the ascent marks their coming, and tugging up the monster gun in its cradle, with "a stamp and go," strange cries, and oaths sworn by some thirty tars, all flushed with honest exercise, while the officer in charge tries to moderate their excessive energies, and to induce the two or three hairy Hercules—who are sitting astride on the gun, or on the few horses in front, with vine-leaves in their hats, or flowers in their hair—to dismount and leave off the music. The astonishment of the stupid fur-capped Crim Tartars, as they stare at this wondrous apparition on its way, is ludicrous to a degree; but Turk, Crim, Russian, or Greek, are all the same to Jack; and he is certain to salute every foreigner who goes by, while in this state, with the universal shibboleth of "Bono! Bono! Johnny!"

The sailors' camp is now formed near the artillery park of the left attack, near the lines of the Third Division. There are about 2,000 men on shore.

The officers who command the Naval Brigade are Captain Stephen Lushington (Albion, 90), Commander-in-Chief; Captain William Peel (Diamond, 25), second in command; Commander Randolph (temporarily disqualified by illness), third in command; Commanders Burnett and Borlase. Lieutenants—First, J. N. Normau (Trafalgar); Second, W. H. Bridge (Vengeance); Third, G. G. reathard (Britannia); Lieutenant Wilmshurst (Trafalgar), Lieutenant Partridge (Queen), Lieutenant Capel (Britannia). Commander Honre, of the Beagle, and Commander Snow, of the Arrow, have landed the heavy guns of their vessels, and rendered excellent service at the naval camp by their exertions. The guns landed by the fleet were furnished by the following vessels, as nearly as I can ascertain:—The Albion landed 6, the Queen 6, the Rodney 6, the Trafalgar 6, the Terrible 2 (heavy metal), the Britannia 6, the Diamond 20—in all 52.

The Marine Battalions, numbering about 1,200 men, are encamped on the heights over Balaklava, but I have not yet been able to ascertain who are the officers in command. They are to have charge of the batteries of howitzers which will be placed on those heights, and are entrusted with the charge of the road to the town from the eastern heights.

Oct. 11.—There was an amusing incident to-day, which I wish I had more time to describe. Towards noon a large ship, under Austrian colours, was seen standing in towards Sebastopol. Fort Constantine opened fire on her at 2,500 yards, but the ship never paid the least attention to the shot and shell which flew over her. The other batteries followed suit; still the Austrian cared not; "not a sheet did she slack, nor a brace, nor a tack," while the Russian shot bulled her and roared through her rigging. She came right in front of the batteries, and passed them unscathed, nearing the shore as she came. The Firebrand went off to her assistance, and received several shot in her hull while doing so; but Captain Stuart persevered, and, aided by a screw gun-boat, brought her off. She was found to be deserted by her crew, who had gone on board the Britannia when the wind failed, and it was found she was getting near Sebastopol. She was laden with 600 tons of hay for the English army, and her escape is almost miraculous, but it is a satisfactory proof of the bad gunnery of the Russians.

PROGRESS OF THE SIEGE OF SEBASTOPOL.

Camp before Sebastopol, Oct. 6.

Lord Raglan and Staff moved yesterday from the town of Balaklava, and established head-quarters near the farm of Dzeuzdu-otur. From the rising ground in front of this position, about a mile and a half distant from head-quarters, the town of Sebastopol is plainly visible. The outworks on the south side are not more than three miles from us, and every day since our army under the mastery march on Balaklava the Russians have been throwing up works and fortifying the exposed portions of the town with the greatest energy.

Another Polish deserter has been brought in to-day. He is a common soldier, and his statements may not be entitled to much weight, but he asserts positively that there are 90,000 men within the walls of Sebastopol. Menschikoff is still commander-in-chief, Gortschakoff second in command, and Chomutoff has the direction of the artillery. The Russians have great confidence in the latter, who is said to have greatly distinguished himself on that apocryphal field of glory, the Caucasus. When he came in the day before yesterday, the garrison received him with tremendous cheering. General Lüders is next in command to Gortschakoff. It appears quite out of the question that the Russians have such a force as 90,000 men in the place; they could not keep them a week.

The Russians are plainly visible through the glass, working like bees; women and children are carrying up earth in baskets, and already the white tower on the right of our lines is blocked up with a double line of earthworks pierced for guns. The fort is no longer the white fort—it has been painted of a buff colour, probably not to look so conspicuous at night.

Our siege train is divided into two "Attacks"—the "Night" and the "Left" Attack. The officers commanding the batteries on the Right Attack are—Lieutenant-Colonel Dickson (who volunteered his services for the battery left vacant by the death of Captain Patten), Captain D'Aguilar, and Captain Strange. The officers commanding the batteries of the Left Attack are—Major Young, Major Freese, and Major Irving. The whole of the siege train is commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Gambier.

From calculations which have been made, it seems probable that the French and English batteries will be capable of hurling no less than 23,600 shot and shell against the enemy's works per diem, and that calculation allows ten minutes' interval for each gun, between round and round. We have opened about 1,500 yards of trench, much of which is in a fit state for the reception of heavy guns. The French have completed somewhat more, say 1,600 metres, and are rather more forward than we are, but they have not yet landed all their heavy guns. Some of their pieces are of brass, and will not stand quick firing, as the metal heats so readily, and when much heated softens and becomes what is technically called "drooping at muzzle."

Illness in the camp diminishes; the weather is very fine; nevertheless, we have to deplore the loss of Major Banner, of the 93rd Highlanders, Lieutenant Freeman, of the Scotch Greys, Lieutenant Walsley, of the 77th, and several men, since last I wrote.

October 5.—At two o'clock p.m., the tattoo was beaten. The garrison made a sortie along the coast on our left. The whole army was in an instant under arms. The Russians, seeing that we were on our guard, retired into the place. Their guns, as on the preceding day, have kept up an incessant fire on our reconnoitring parties. In the evening a convoy, said to consist of 4,000 men, entered Sebastopol. It was to draw our attention to another point that the garrison had feigned a sortie.

October 6.—We are still living in expectation. The unavoidable tediousness of our preparations cannot be helped. The Russians, however, will lose nothing for waiting. The four fleets are rapidly landing their heaviest artillery, and if they continue at the present rate the fire will be opened with 1,200 guns. Fancy the tremendous uproar they will cause when they all come into play. We may dance to that delightful concert, for English ladies are not wanting in our camps. The Captain of Engineers, Schmitt, had his thigh carried off by a cannon-ball while effecting a reconnoissance, and expired an hour afterwards. The French army to us in him a brave and intelligent officer, and will share the grief of the two brothers of the worthy captain, who are serving here in its ranks.

October 7, at Noon.—Ten battalions of Russian infantry, and sixteen squadrons of the relieving army, have shown themselves at the north-western extremity of our lines, close to the telegraph. Our advanced posts are on foot, and crowds of curious persons line the high grounds. It is so long since we beheld our adversaries on the Ahna! Twenty rounds, fired by the British artillery, drove them back a little, but they still remain within sight.

It is now ascertained that eight Russian ships have been sunk at the entrance of the bay. They are in two lines, the second line covering the interstices of the first. The bay at the point where they lie is about 700 yards across, so that the entrance is effectually barred to ships of the line, though steamers might manage to obtain an entrance, the more so as the masts of the sunken vessels still indicate their position. At the head of the harbour, which runs up to the east of the town, a large line-of-battle ship, probably the Twelve Apostles, is moored, and can be used as a battery; but there can be no doubt that it will be speedily destroyed by the fire of the English guns. The enemy have established a steam ferry between the town and the northern side of the bay, by which they can be reinforced by the troops marched down from the interior, or retreat when the town is no longer tenable.

OFF SEBASTOPOL, October 8.—Our operations proceed with rapidity. The trench was opened on the third, and by the 6th the first parallel was finished. The works proved less difficult than we had expected, after our first examination of the spot. At first, after removing the superficial earth, we came upon a tufa rock, which, however, was of no great extent. Last night our engineers traced the lines of a powerful battery of thirty-five guns. The position of this battery is at the extreme left, behind the Quarantine Port, and near a lazaretto; it will protect the first parallel, and sustain the attack on the left. We hope to get it completely established in eight and forty hours. Work in the day is made difficult by the enemy, but I can tell you we make good use of the nights.

The other works will commence to-morrow, that is to say, judging from all appearances. The left battery is likely to have the honour of opening the fire; it will occupy the enemy, and thus protected we can continue our further approaches. We shall have 200 pieces of artillery. The Russians have also a large number of guns, and those very heavy. They have fired red-hot shot, which has done us no great harm. Hitherto we have found no indications of the mines by which the environs of Sebastopol were intersected, as we were told. Any mines that they may have made can hardly extend further than 250 metres.

The cholera is sensibly declining.

SORTIE ON THE TWELFTH OF OCTOBER.

Colonel Waddy, Captain Gray, and Lieutenant Mangles, 50th, have been wounded by a shell. Contrary to their usual custom, the Russian batteries were again silent last night. This silence was so ominous that we fully expected a sortie from the fort, and it was also rumoured that the Russians said to be in our rear would attack Balaklava, while the Greeks were to aid them by setting fire to the town. The information on this point was so positive that the authorities resorted to the extreme measure of ordering the Greeks—men, women, and children—to leave the town, and the order was rigidly carried into effect ere evening. An exception was made in favour of the Tartar families, who were all permitted to remain. The Greeks were consoled in their flight by the thought that they carried off with them a good deal of plunder, in the shape of clothes which had been left with them to wash, and that they were allowed to take all their property with them. Lieutenant-Colonel Davenport is commandant of the town. Captain Gordon, R.E., commenced the formation of our right attack soon after dark. 400 men were furnished from the 2nd and Light Divisions on the works, and strong covering parties were sent out in front and in rear to protect them. The working party was divided into four companies of 100 men each, and they worked on during the night with such good will that ere morning No. 1 party had completed 160 yards; No. 2, 78 yards; No. 3, 95 yards; No. 4, 30 yards—in all 363 yards of trench ready for conversion into batteries. These trenches are covered very perfectly. It was intended that a party of similar strength should be employed on the left and centre; but, owing to one of those accidents which unavoidably occur in night work, the sappers and miners missed their way, and got in advance towards the lines of the enemy. They were perceived by an advanced post, which seems to have been the van of a sortie. The Russians opened fire on them at short distance with rifles; and, wonderful to relate, missed them all. The flashes, however, showed our men that strong battalions of Russian infantry were moving silently on towards our works, and the alarm was given to the division in the rear. At 1.25 a furious cannonade was opened by the enemy on our lines, as they had then ascertained that we had discovered their approach. The Second and Light Divisions turned out, and our field-guns attached to them opened fire on the enemy, who were advancing under the fire of our batteries. Owing to some misunderstanding, the covering parties received orders to retire, and fell back on their lines—all but one company of riflemen, who maintained the ground with tenacity, and fired into the columns of the enemy with effect. The Russians pushed on field-pieces to support their assault. The batteries behind them were lurid with incessant flashes, and the roar of shot and shell filled the air, mingled with the constant ping-pinging of rifle and musket-balls. All the camps were up. The French on our left got under arms, and the rattle of drums and the shrill blast of trumpets were heard amid the roll of cannon and small arms. For nearly half-an-hour this din lasted, till all of a sudden a ringing cheer was audible on our right, rising through all the turmoil. It was the cheer of the 58th, as they were ordered to charge down the hill on their unseen enemy. It had its effect; for the Russians, already pounded by our guns and shaken by the fire of our infantry, as well as by the aspect of the whole hill-side lined with our battalions, turned and fled under the shelter of their guns. Their loss is not known; ours was very trifling. The sortie was completely foiled, and not an inch of our lines was injured, while the four-gun battery (the main object of their attack) was never closely approached at all. The alarm over, every one returned quietly to tent, to bivouac.

Oct. 13.—Lord Raglan has issued a severe order yesterday respecting some neglect he witnessed of the sick at Balaklava; more of this in a future letter. Sir John Burgoyne fixed sites yesterday for batteries which will destroy the shipping. They are to be mounted with four 8 and 10-inch guns, about 1,900 yards from the vessels. The Russians' fire was very slack all night, and it is not very lively to-day up to post-hour.

NEWS RECEIVED IN LONDON ON FRIDAY EVENING.

(By International Telegraph.)

We have received the following via Vienna, from a correspondent at Constantinople:—

"Constantinople, Oct. 19.

"No news has yet been received that the bombardment began on the 17th, as was proposed.

"Lord Raglan was requested to spare one part of the town, where the women and children would be sent. He replied that could not be, but that they might leave the town unharmed.

"The British now occupy part of the northern shore of the bay, and their guns command the harbour."

BOMBARDMENT OF SEBASTOPOL.

The correspondence from the seat of war all proves that the allied armies before Sebastopol have had to surmount greater obstacles than had been generally foreseen in the preliminary operations of the siege, and their tedious but necessary preparations have occupied about twenty days from the arrival of the forces at Balaklava to the opening of the fire of the besieging batteries. The allied commanders have, however, judged—and, no doubt, rightly—that it would be rash and imprudent to attempt a sudden assault against a fortress of such strength and extent, for the chance of a failure in such an attack could not but produce a most unfavourable effect upon the army, and even its success would probably be purchased by enormous losses. The time spent by the allies in these preliminary operations has, therefore, been especially devoted to secure the success of their enterprise, and to spare the lives of the troops; and, if these two objects are accomplished, we shall have no reason to complain of the result. The British batteries were ready, though not unmasked, on the 13th, but the French, who had not begun to land their siege-train quite so soon as our forces, were about two days in arrear. The principal works were, however, finished by both armies on the 15th; and authentic intelligence has been received that on the 17th a vigorous attack was made on the place, supported by a portion of the fleet, against the marine batteries, in which it is said that 500 Russians, including an admiral in the imperial service, were killed.

VIENNA, Wednesday Morning, 10 o'clock.

The following is official Russian news, received via Warsaw, of the 23rd:—

"The garrison makes frequent sorties at night; not a single shell has yet fallen into the town itself."

"Warsaw, Oct. 24.

"During the whole of the 17th Sebastopol was bombarded by sea and land. The Russians also kept up a hot fire.

"The Russian fortifications have suffered but little.

"Five hundred Russians were killed or wounded, and Admiral Kornileff was among the killed."

VIENNA, Wednesday, 8 a.m.

Advices from Constantinople state that there is no truth in the report that Eupatoria has been retaken by the Russians.

A rumour prevailed in the camp on the 11th that the Simferopol army would attack it, and that the Greeks in Balaklava would, at the same time, set fire to the town.

All the Greeks were therefore forced to quit Balaklava.

A sortie was made by the Russians on the 11th, but they were repulsed.

We read in a Constantinople letter of the 10th, in a Vienna newspaper:—"General Canrobert acts in perfect wisdom in all things with Lord Raglan. The two commanders have made the last summonses to Sebastopol to yield, so as to prevent the effusion of blood. A messenger has, besides, been sent with a flag of truce to the commander of the fortress, with the proposition to send away the women, children, old men, and sick, and to hoist a flag on the hospital, in order that it may be spared. We are assured that the allied commanders have resolved to respect the town itself, but to bombard the forts and batteries, the public establishments, and those of the Crown. The last lines of circumvallation approach so near the town of Sebastopol, that the allies who occupy the heights can see the inhabitants walking about."

PARIS, Wednesday.

A despatch from St. Petersburg of the 24th announces that the allies opened their fire on the 17th, as well from the land batteries as from the fleet.

On the 18th the bombardment was continued from the land batteries alone.

Two great difficulties are spoken of as likely to delay success or to cause it to be more dearly purchased. It is impossible to attack the place by regular siege operations, for the earth on every side of Sebastopol is found to be less than a foot in depth; in some places the solid rock is only four inches below the surface. This quite disposes of the question of parallels, zigzags, and all the engineering technicalities which come under the name of regular approaches. It only remains to batter the wall and forts at a long range, and then to carry the place by assault.

LETTERS ABOUT THE ARMY IN THE CRIMEA.

DAILY COMMUNICATIONS WITH THE EAST.—The Paris correspondent of the Independence Belge, writes to that journal that the French, English, and Turkish authorities at Constantinople have combined to organise a service which will supply a daily communication between the Crimea and the capitals of England and France. A steamer, it is said, will be dispatched day by day, as a rule, from Sebastopol, Balaklava, or some other convenient port to Constantinople, whence the intelligence it conveys will be forwarded by courier to Bucharest, and thence further to Cronstadt or Hermanstadt, both in Transylvania, and the nearest respective termini of the Austrian telegraphic line. In the present and expected state of navigation and of the country to be traversed it is not anticipated that news will be transmitted under this arrangement in a shorter space than eight or nine days. The extension of a telegraphic line from a point in the Austrian system to Bucharest will abridge the interval by a day; but this work is not likely to be complete for a month or five weeks.

THE WOUNDED AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—English sick and wounded men were in hospital at the Island of Rhodes, about the beginning of this century, under the care of that humane and gallant admiral, the late Sir Sidney Smith, by whom the mildness and salubrity of the climate and the advantages of the locality for hospital purposes were always deservedly extolled.

At the present moment it may be worth consideration whether the removal of a portion of our invalids from the piercing cold which will soon prevail in the neighbourhood of the Bosphorus to the mild climate of Rhodes would not be attended by many advantages. The transport would be easily effected by some steamers at small cost, and during the winter months fuel and clothing would be economised, while comforts and luxuries would be enjoyed by convalescents, tending to promote more speedy restoration to health and return to duty.

There are buildings at Rhodes which, with a small outlay, would afford the requisite accommodation. Commander Spratt, R.N., author of "Travels in Lycia," &c., and now commanding her Majesty's ship Spitfire in the Black Sea, has lately surveyed the island, and is thoroughly acquainted with the details and the resources of the neighbourhood.—I have the honour to be, Sir, your most obedient servant, W. SANFORD.

NURSES FOR SCUTARI.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—As I happened to be staying at the Hôtel des Bains, at Boulogne, yesterday, when the thirty-seven nurses selected by Government to accompany Miss F. Nightingale to the hospitals at Scutari passed through on their way to Paris, under the care of Mr. and Mrs. Bracebridge, I think it may not be uninteresting to you to learn how great was the enthusiasm with which they were received at Boulogne by all those who knew upon what errand of mercy these persons were bent.

The fishwomen conveyed their baggage to the railway free of charge. M. Mesurent, the proprietor of the Hôtel des Bains (to which place a telegraphic message had been sent from London directing that a dinner should be prepared), provided a sumptuous banquet; and requested that they would order anything more they might desire, but that they must accept everything under his roof as a token of his good wishes for the enterprise. The waiters and the chambermaids were profuse in their attentions to them, but were unanimous in refusing remuneration.

The enthusiastic satisfaction with which they all spoke of this visit last night showed how deep-seated was their sympathy with the devoted mission of these our countrywomen; and feeling, therefore, that it is but right that the English public should be aware this sympathy exists, I have ventured to trespass on your valuable space with these few lines.

—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

Pavilion Hotel, Folkestone, Oct. 24. D. G.

FRAGMENTS FROM A FRENCH JOURNAL.

"CAMP ABOVE SEBASTOPOL, October 4.—We enjoy here the climate of Italy. A Zouave, taken prisoner, has escaped from Sebastopol. He states that sixty English and French marauders, surprised by the Cossacks, had refused to work at the fortifications of the place, and been removed to the interior of the country. Seeing a chance of escaping, he had consented to work, had concealed himself in a hole, and succeeded at night in reaching our advanced posts. The Russians, he says, are very fond of the French, and treat them with kindness, but they entertain a different feeling towards our allies. A Russian officer, disguised as a Turk, has been arrested in our camp. Last night a squadron of Lancers sallied out of Sebastopol, with the intention of surprising a post of Zouaves. An engagement ensued, and the Lancers were repulsed. It was the first dark night we had since our landing, and, for the first time, the weather was rainy. Two Zouaves were killed.

THE "TIMES" NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.—The fund for the sick and wounded in the Eastern expedition, which we have undertaken to distribute, having now exceeded £10,000, we have to return our thanks to all who have so generously responded to our invitation in this matter, and at the same time to announce that no further subscriptions for this purpose will be received at the Times-office. In making this announcement, we take the opportunity to inform those persons who have favoured us with their donations to the Patriotic Fund and other charitable undertakings, that subscriptions for such objects should be forwarded direct to the treasurers specially appointed to collect and account for those contributions.—Times of October 25.

MISCELLANEOUS ANECDOTES, INCIDENTS, AND MEMORANDA.

A SURGEON writes:—"I have seen some curious wounds from the course taken by the balls. One man, who fell by my side, roared out, 'Oh, doctor, I am killed,' but, on tearing open his clothes, I found the ball had not gone deeper than the skin. A cannon-ball passed close to me, and over the head of a man who was lying on the ground; you could see the round shot passing by you like swift bowling at cricket. The Russians had an ugly trick of lying on the ground, pretending to be wounded, and firing at us as soon as we passed, so our men massacred them right and left."

AMONG the many daring exploits of the intrepid men by whose energy and unshaken courage the allied arms have been carried to the heights of the Alma, we have not heard of an instance which surpasses in cool daring the conduct of Lieutenants Lindsey and Thistlethwaite, of the Scots Fusilier Guards, the Queen's colours being carried by the former, and the regimental colours by the latter gentleman. At the moment before the heights were gained, and when the deadly struggle raged so fiercely as to make it almost impossible to tell friend from foe, the two lieutenants became separated from their battalion, and found themselves, with the four sergeants whose duty it was to support them, attacked by a body of Russians, whose commanding officer had led them against the colours. A desperate conflict ensued, the four sergeants quickly fell under a shower of balls. The Queen's colour, carried by Mr. Lindsey, was torn into stripes, being pierced by a cloud of bullets. The staff was shot in two; still the gallant officers persevered, and succeeded in cutting their way through the enemy who surrounded them. They were ably assisted, and at the right moment, by Captain Drummond, the adjutant of the regiment, whose horse was at that moment shot under him. Captain Lindsey, seeing the danger to which the colours were exposed, rushed to the relief, and, with a revolver pistol, shot three of the assailants. The successful bearers of the standard escaped almost miraculously, and succeeded in planting their colours on the heights, which had been then but just won from the Russians, Mr. Lindsey having actually climbed the steep face of the hill with the aid of the broken staff, while he exultingly waved what remained of it, with her Majesty's colours, over his head. Neither this gallant gentleman nor his equally distinguished companion, Mr. Thistlethwaite, received any hurt.

Another account says:—Mr. LINDSEY bore the Queen's colours, in the Scots Fusiliers, which received twenty-one shots through them, and the staff was broken in his hand by a grape-shot. The regimental colours carried by Mr. Thistlethwaite had twenty-four rifle and musket-balls through them. How the bearers escaped uninjured appears almost miraculous. So deadly and so concentrated was the fire to which the brigade of Guards was exposed, that at one time it seemed impossible that they could deploy under it from open column into line. Yet the officers were perfectly cool—ordered the movement, and the men obeyed it as if on parade. The Guards carried the redoubt, and lost seventeen officers killed and wounded. Only three officers in the whole brigade escaped entirely untouched. All the others were either wounded, slightly contused by spent bullets, or shot through their bear-skin caps and clothes.

COL. STEELE, Lord Raglan's military secretary, was for some time supposed to have fallen. Lord Raglan, in the heat of the fight, ordered him to ride to the brigade of Guards and give the order to advance, intending, of course, that, the order being given, he should return to his place with the staff. The moment was, however, too exciting for the hot blood of the military secretary, and, having given the order of his chief, he rushed forward himself with his old battalion, and did not again present himself to Lord Raglan until he came to announce that the field was won, and to ask forgiveness for the breach of orders of which he had been guilty in joining in the brilliant charge of the Guards which so largely aided in gaining the battle.

THE GUARDS AND HIGHLANDERS suffered most in coming through the vineyard, yet they would have never broken their ranks, but for one temptation—the large clusters of ripe grapes. These, to men parched with thirst, who had not even seen vegetables for three weeks, were irresistible; so for that, and for that only, the men turned slightly aside to pull them as they passed. It appears ridiculous, but it is literally true that our men charged up the heights, under a most murderous fire, with their Minies in one hand and a huge bunch of grapes which they were stuffing into their mouths with the other. The officers were similarly employed. As the Duke led on his division for a moment all thought he was killed. He was completely hidden in the smoke of some cannon, and one 24-pounder passed close by his head. Sir Colin Campbell, much to their dissatisfaction, would not let the Highlanders fire a single shot until they had arrived within thirty feet of the enemy. Then their murderous discharges carried all before them. By not firing, the bonnie Scots were enabled to advance with such rapidity that the enemy's cannon had hardly time to get their range before they were out of it again. Consequently, their loss was but slight compared with that of the other brigades. Lord Raglan was so pleased at this proof of Sir Colin's experience and generalship in saving his men, that he rode up on the field of battle, and shaking him warmly by the hand, asked him what he could do for him? Sir Colin acknowledged the thanks, and asked his lordship's permission to wear the Highland feather bonnet for the rest of the campaign, instead of the general's cocked hat. Of course, the permission was instantly given, and Sir Colin appeared the next morning in the bonnet of waving plume, to the intense delight of the Highlanders, who went into ecstasies of cheers whenever he came among them.

DR. MACKENZIE, one of the best operators in Edinburgh, who came out for the purpose of studying gun-shot wounds, was, with the Highlanders, foremost in the field. So unremitting was his attention to the Highlanders, to which, though a civilian, by a general order of Lord Raglan acknowledging his services, he had been attached, that after the battle the brigade, with one voice, asked permission to give him three cheers as he came up the hill. I mention this circumstance for two reasons. First, because there are few gentlemen who stood so high in their profession as Dr. Mackenzie who would have given up a lucrative practice for the purpose of devoting their services unpaid to the relief of their countrymen during an arduous campaign; and next, because I wish to pay a slight tribute of respect to the memory of one who has fallen a victim to his exertions to relieve the sufferings of others. He died of cholera at Belbek after a few hours' illness, and his loss was more sincerely lamented than that of any man who fell at Alma.

THE BATTLE OF THE ALMA.—The following is an extract from a letter written by Paymaster-Sergeant Joiner, 93rd Highlanders, and published in the Glasgow Daily Mail:—"Numerous big guns were not, properly speaking, firing, but were in reality vomiting forth liquid fire. The very earth was shaking, and the sun in the heavens, seen through the smoke, looked pale and sickly. Step after step we climbed up-hill, reached the batteries, some seizing hold of a horse, some of a Russ, and others dismounting the guns—beautiful 24-pounders. From that position which we held we poured dreadful volleys upon the thousands that retreated behind the guns, but they stood firm. Our brigade came within thirty paces of their 32nd battalion—about 12,000 strong—and we pressed down on the charge. In doing so, we cut off a great many of their officers, took one general prisoner, and one distinguished man was shot down before me. He had on a costly gold cross, which our general claimed for the country, and I have his sword."

THE FRENCH suffered severely as they climbed the hill to turn the enemy's flank. As the Zouaves approached, the Russians, misled by their red fezzes and peculiar dress, rushed down upon them, shouting, "Turco! Turco!" expecting an easy victory. They were miserably deceived. The Zouaves halted, deployed into line, gave one tremendous volley, and then charged with the bayonet, driving the enemy back with fearful slaughter.

THE REDOUT ATTACKED by the French made but slight resistance; for our allies, under cover of a fire from the fleet, got their guns up by an easy road, and threw shell into it. When it was stormed, the first who attempted to scale the stone wall which protected it were all killed. A French lieutenant, however, succeeded in fastening his handkerchief to a slight projection of one of the scaffold poles (for the work, which was intended for a regular stone fort, was unfinished), and so swung himself on to the parapet with the tricolour in his hand. Though fiercely attacked and wounded in many places with bullets and bayonets, he succeeded in maintaining his post and his standard until assistance arrived, when the work was captured. For this service the lieutenant, whose name I have unfortunately forgotten, is to be made a lieutenant-colonel.

THE STORIES OF INDIVIDUAL PROWESS on the part of our troops and officers would fill a volume. Poor Captain Monck, of the 7th, had run one man through with his sword, and had struck down another (who was in the act of firing at him) with a blow of his clenched fist, when he was shot dead by the rear-rank man. A private of the same regiment, ere they were driven back, rushed to the front and bayoneted in quick succession two men of the foremost column of the enemy—in fact, the anecdotes of this kind are innumerable, and seem to have occurred all over the field.

SOON AFTER DAWN, the next day after the battle of Alma, the French assembled all their drums and trumpets on the top of the highest of the hills they carried, and a wild flourish and roll, repeated again and again, and broken by peals of sound from the bugles of the infantry, celebrated their victory ere they departed. It was spirited, stirring, and thrilling music, and its effect, as it swelled through the darkness of early morning down over the valley, can never be forgotten.

AMONG OTHER OFFICERS who have fallen victims to disease since the action of the 20th are, Lieut.-Colonel Sidney Beckwith, 1st battalion Rifle Brigade; and Ensign F. H. Phipps, 19th regiment—buried together on the shore at Belbek; Lieut.-Colonel W. F. Hoey, commanding the 30th regiment; Lieut. Grant, 79th Highlanders, nephew to Lord Elgin, and formerly in his staff in Canada; 1st class staff-surgeon, Dr. Mitchell; and the Rev. Mr. Moekler, the chaplain attached to the 3rd division. The last-named gentleman was buried at Balaklava, on the 30th Sept. The sick at the General Hospital and Invalid Depot established there are suffering severely.

THE RUSSIAN COLUMNS ON THE HILLS OF ALMA poured down valley after valley upon our advancing regiments, and the battery hurled its shell and round shot among them, plunging up and bursting their lines. Our men greeted each hostile discharge with loud cheers, and still kept advancing, firing and loading as they went. Here was witnessed the first splendid effect of the Minié rifle, not only as a superior weapon in itself, but also as giving confidence to the soldier causing him to rely upon the efficacy of his fire, and making him at the same time anxious to have every shot of his tell. The men, far from raising their muskets hastily, and popping them off into blue air, paused before they fired, singled out the objects at which they proposed to aim, and taking their aim coolly and deliberately, discharged their pieces. This fire did dreadful execution among the Russians. It made the fire of their battery slow and irregular; for while the guns were being served, it frequently happened that the leaden hailstorm from our battalions picked off the men that were in the act of pointing or priming the pieces; and though the Russians were remarkably steady, and fresh men stepped in to fill the place of the killed and disabled, and though in this way all the guns of the battery were worked to the last moment, still much precious time was lost from the service of the guns being interrupted, though but for moments, yet continually. When our troops entered the batteries, they saw that their Minié balls had stopped many of the enemy's gunners in the act of pointing and priming guns. Some of them actually lay over the guns on which they had fallen when they were struck to death.

WHAT IS THAT GREN MESS ON THE PLAIN, which seems down upon it almost without life or motion? Now and then, indeed, an arm may be seen waved aloft, or a man raises himself for a moment, looks around, and then lies down again. Alas! that plain is covered with the wounded Russians still. Nearly sixty long hours have they passed in agony on the ground, and now, with but little hope of help or succour more, we must leave them as they lie. All this nameless, inconceivable misery—this cruel pain—to be caused by the caprice of one man! Seven hundred and fifty wounded men are still upon the ground, and we can do nothing for them. Their wounds have been bound and dressed—we have done all we can do for them—and now, unable as we are to take them along with us or to send them away, we must depart. Ere our troops marched, however, General Estcourt, by order of Lord Raglan, sent into the Tartar village up the valley, into which the inhabitants were just returning, and having procured the attendance of the head men, he proceeded to explain to them that the wounded Russians would be confided to their charge, and that they were to feed and maintain them, and when they were well they were to let them go their ways. In order to look over their wounds, an English surgeon was left behind with these 750 men. This most painful and desolate duty devolved on Dr. Thomson, of the 44th Regiment. He was told his mission would be his protection in case the Cossacks came, and that he was to hoist a flag of truce, should the enemy appear in sight, and then, provided with some rum, biscuit, and salt-meat, he was left alone with his charge. Ere the army went, however, one of the Russian officers addressed the wounded, and explained the position in which they were placed, and they promised to obey Dr. Thomson's orders, to protect him as far as they could, and to acquaint any Russian force which might arrive with the particular circumstances under which he was among them. It is quite certain that the Russians will have to reconsider their preconceived opinions against us before they have done with us. A great change has already come over the feelings of the poor wretches who were taken down to the boats, and when many of the officers and captains and mates of transports presented them with cigars, which, as the poor wounded could not well move, though somehow they managed to smoke, they lighted and put into the mouths of the sufferers. On these occasions I have seen tears rush out of the eyes of our barbarous enemies, and many a shattered hand or broken arm was frantically held up to the sky with a prayer that God might reward the kindness shown to them.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE, says a letter from Balaklava, has been very unfortunate with his baggage. On Saturday he lost it for a few hours, and to-day his waggon broke down, destroying all the bottles in his stock.

IN THE HOUSE LORD RAGLAN OCCUPIED at Balaklava, was a lady who had fled from Sebastopol to escape us. The few Russians who remained quietly in their homes were kindly treated by the British soldiery. His Royal Highness the Duke passed the night in the humble cot of a peasant, who had mustered courage enough to stand firm. The old man kissed the hands of those who were his guests.

FOR REASONS BEST KNOWN TO THEMSELVES THE RUSSIAN GENERALS have persuaded their soldiers that they had to expect the worst treatment if they fell into the hands of the English and French; and a great many of them actually believed that if captured they had to prepare for instant decapitation. I am told that even officers were found to labour under this strange mistake. One wounded officer, when he saw the fatigue party all covered with mud and blood, approaching him, to carry him, resisted their attempts to seize him, and called aloud for an officer. When the officer in command of the party came up, the Russian said, in French, he was prepared to die; but being an officer and a gentleman, he had a right to demand that no one below his own rank should cut off his head. It cost some trouble to convince the poor man of our friendly intentions.

LITERARY MEN AT ALMA.—The author of "Fother," Mr. Kinglake, was a volunteer on Lord Raglan's staff at the battle of Alma. Mr. Layard witnessed the engagement from the masthead of the Agamemnon (a safe position), and wrote an account of it for the Times; while Mr. Russell, the Times' regular correspondent, made a dash into the battle to see the affair, and had his horse shot under him, but sustained no injury.

GENERAL CANROBERT was wounded, on the 20th, by a piece of a shell which struck him on the left breast; fortunately, it did not penetrate the flesh, but the effect of the contusion has been such as to deprive him, in a great degree, of the use of his left arm.

WE UNDERSTAND, on good authority, that the French return of 1,400 killed and wounded includes those who have died of cholera. More than one message was, at Alma, sent from our allies to us for aid during the struggle. On one occasion the officer who came to Lord Raglan was on foot, and seemed much excited. He pointed out a wall, behind which a large body of Russian infantry were stationed, who delivered a tremendous fire on the swerving mass of French skirmishers as they struggled up the hill, and requested us to direct the fire of our artillery upon it, as the French were encumbered by the Russians, and that request was speedily complied with.

IT IS SAID, that at Alma a very young officer of the 7th Regiment was the first to gain the top, and that, clambering up to one of the embrasures between the interval of firing and loading the gun, he jumped into the battery. So unexpected was his appearance among the Russians, and, perhaps, so dense the smoke, that little attention was paid to him, which he, resenting as an insult, took his own way of making his presence felt and respected. He carried a revolver, of which he fired the six barrels in succession, and, as may be supposed, from the locality, with deadly aim. The Russian gunners were so vastly astonished that they let him have his way, and only when he had fired his last shot he observed one of the fellows taking up a carbine and covering him. The situation was awkward, but the officer flung his pistol at his assailant, and hit him a blow between the eyes, which caused him to roll over, stunned, and hors de combat for the time being. At that moment the gallant 7th and 23rd entered the battery and expelled the Russians, who, however, returning with fresh forces before we could make good our advantage, dislodged our troops and drove them out. The Guards and Highlanders arriving next, retook the battery, and held it; but, in the meanwhile, the Russians had removed their guns. The final conquest of the battery decided the fortune of the day.

THE FIRST VILLA WE CAME TO on the march from Alma was the residence of a physician or country surgeon. It had been ruthlessly destroyed by the Cossacks. A verandah, laden with clematis, roses, and lily-of-the-valley in front, was filled with broken music stools, work-tables, and lounging chairs. All the glass of the windows was smashed. Everything around betokened the hasty flight of the inmates. Two or three side-saddles were lying on the grass outside the hall door, a parasol lay near them, close to Tartar saddle and huge whip. The wine casks were broken and the contents spilt, the barley and corn of the granary were thrown about all over the ground, broken china and glass of fine manufacture were scattered over the pavement outside the kitchen, and amid all the desolation and ruin of the place a cat sat blandly at the threshold, winking her eyes in the sunshine at the new comers. No pen can describe the scene within. Mirrors in fragments were lying on the floor, the beds had been ripped open, and the feathers littered the rooms a foot deep; chairs, sofas, fauteuils, bedsteads, book-cases, picture frames, images of saints, women's needlework, chests of drawers, shoes, boots, books, bottles, physic jars, all smashed or torn in pieces, lay in heaps in every room. Even the walls and doors were lashed with swords. The very genius of destruction had been at work, and had revelled in mischief. The physician's account-book lay open on a broken table; he had been stopped in the very act of debiting a dose to some neighbour, and the entry remained unfinished. Beside his account-book lay a volume of Madame de Sévigné's Letters in French and a Pharmacopœia in Russian. A little bottle of prussic acid lay so invitingly near a box of bonbons that I knew it would be irresistible to the first hungry private who had a taste for almonds, and I accordingly poured out the contents to prevent the possible catastrophe. Our men and horses were soon revelling in grapes and corn, and we pushed on to Eskel, and established ourselves in a house which had belonged to a Russian officer of rank—at least many traces of the presence of one was visible. Every house and villa in the place was a similar scene to that which I have in vain tried to describe. The better the class of the residence the more complete and pitiable the destruction. Grand pianos and handsome pieces of furniture, covered with silk and damasked velvet, rent to pieces with brutal violence, were found in more than one house, but one of the instruments retained enough of its vital organs to breathe out "God save the Queen" from its lacerated brass ribs, and it was made to do so accordingly—aye, under the very eye of a rigid portrait of his Imperial Majesty the Czar which hung on the wall above! These portraits of the Autocrat were not uncommon in the houses—nearly as common as pictures of saints with gilt and silver glories round their heads. The houses, large and small, consist of one storey only, and magnitude is gained by lateral extension. Each house stands apart, with a large patch of vineyard around it, and a garden of fruit trees, and is fenced in from the road by a stone wall and a line of poplars or elms.

HOW TO OBTAIN KNOWLEDGE.—Towards the evening of October 1st, four Zouaves were seen walking, as it were, reeling drunk towards the walls of Sebastopol, just above the ship which had so long annoyed the allies. The Russians, thinking they were a sure catch, let them come quite close, and then sent out half-a-dozen armed men to bring them in, upon which the Frenchmen took to their heels at a railway pace, followed by the shots of the hopeful Russians, and reached their camp in safety, possessed of all the information they required as to the position and strength of the several forts and ships against which they are especially to act. These pretended friends of Bacchus were shrewd engineer officers, seeking important knowledge.

TURKISH REJOICINGS.—The Turks illuminated their houses with great taste for the battle of Alma. Passing down the Bosphorus on the evening of the 23rd ult., the traveller saw at every window a flood of light, and at all suitable positions there flamed Roman candles and large braziers, casting forth a red glare into the night. Turks and Franks joined heartily in the rejoicings; the Armenians with equal readiness but less sincerity; the houses of the Greeks alone were left in darkness. Fuad Effendi was conspicuous by the extent and taste of his illumination, and many of the wealthier Turks must have spent a considerable sum in testifying their loyalty and joy. A few days after, the inhabitants of the capital were directed to hold themselves in readiness for a second display, which should celebrate the fall of Sebastopol and the conquest of the Crimea, so immediately at hand did the full success of the great enterprise appear.

MENSCHIKOFF.—The Journal de St. Petersburg, of the 15th inst., announces that Prince Menschikoff is appointed commander-in-chief and governor of all the imperial forces in the Crimea. The journal does not say whether this is a recompense for his allowing the allies to land without his firing a shot; for his "skilful retreat" after the defeat of the Alma; for his having allowed the allies to walk unmolested round Sebastopol; or for his glorious immolation of the Russian ships of war in the harbour; or whether it be a compensation for the loss of his carriage, money, and papers, on the night of the 20th. The same ukase appoints General Tchoudjeff, hitherto commanding the 6th corps, to the command of all reserve infantry troops; and gives the 6th corps to General Prince Gortsebakoff III., a brother of the Xenophon of the Danube.

A KNIGHT OF THE GARTER.—It is reported that the Emperor Nicholas has called upon a high Wallachian functionary to restore the decoration bestowed upon him during the occupation of the Principalities by Russia, seeing that he has, since their evacuation, gone over to the side of Austria and the Porte. Strange that it did not occur to the Czar, when issuing this mandate, that by the same rule he ought to restore the insignia of the Garter to Queen Victoria.

AT ALMA a group of English soldiers were looking at a dead Russian, whose side and leg a shell had nearly carried away, when one of our Turkish drivers came up and began to feel the Russian's leg. We wondered what the fellow meant to do; but soon the mystery was explained—out came the knife—to slit the leg of the dead man's trousers was the work of a moment, disclosing, to our astonishment, the Russian soldier's method of carrying his money. About 8s. rewarded the Osmanli's sagacity; you may be sure the legs of the dead were carefully examined afterward, as the Russian soldiers carry their money in a small leather purse strapped round the leg.

GENERAL CANROBERT.

(From the Mondeur de l'Armée.)

If anything could diminish the regret of the country at a moment when it deplores the loss of the illustrious Marshal whom death has carried off in the midst of his triumphs, it would be the choice of the young General whom the Emperor has intrusted with the task of finishing the work so gloriously commenced on the banks of the Alma. Although the military career of the new Commander-in-Chief of the French troops in the East is generally known, we think it will be of use to recall to mind his services, which justify in a striking manner the confidence of the head of the state and of the whole army. François Certain Canrobert was born in 1809, in the department of Lot, a few leagues from the village which gave birth to Murat. He entered the school of St. Cyr in the month of November, 1826, and left in one of the first ranks after two years of laborious study. Appointed sub-lieutenant of the 45th of the line on the 1st of October, 1828, he was made lieutenant on the 26th of June, 1833, embarked for Africa in 1835, and arrived in the province of Oran, where the Emir, Abd-el-Kader, after the unfortunate affair of the Macta, kept our army in check. A short time afterwards he took part in the expedition of Mascara, in which he began to make himself known. He followed with his regiment the operations which Generals Clauzel and Letaing directed in the province of Oran; the capture of Tlemcen; the expedition of the Chetiff Aach-goun, and the Mbia; the retaking of Tlemcen; the combats of Sidi-Zacoub, Tafna, and Sikkah. These affairs displayed his brilliant military qualities, and raised him to the rank of captain on the 26th of April, 1837. He went in the same year to the province of Constantine, where the Duke de Nemours and General Duméril made preparations to revenge a deep insult. He received a wound in the leg at the assault of that place, by the side of Colonel Combes, an old soldier of the island of Milla, to whom he was orderly officer, and who was mortally wounded at the breach. Before he died, Colonel Combes recommended the young captain to Marshal Valée as an officer full of promise.

General Canrobert returned to France in 1839, decorated with the Legion of Honour, and was charged with organising for the Foreign Legion a battalion chosen from the hands of Spaniards who had taken refuge with Cabrera upon the French territory. Thanks to the persevering activity of the organiser, these remnants of the civil war were very soon ready to take part in the labours of our troops in Algeria.

Called to the camp of St. Omer, in 1840, he drew up with success, by order of the Duke of Orleans, several chapters of a manual destined for the use of the officers of the light troops. In the north Captain Canrobert was incorporated with the 6th battalion of Foot Chasseurs, and returned to Africa in 1841. In that new campaign he signalled himself in the combats of the mountains of Monzia and Du Coutes, as well as in the obstinate struggle which the Beni-Menasser made against our troops. After having attained the rank of Chief of Battalion of the 15th Light, on the 22nd of May, 1842, he was placed at the head of the 5th battalion of Chasseurs, which was necessarily in the field on the banks of the Chetiff, and took part under the orders of General Gentil in the affair of the grottoes and that of Sbeah, and also in several combats on the Riu.

Part of the year 1842 and the whole of the year 1843 were employed in fresh operations in Africa, and in all of them General Canrobert worthily maintained the honour of his battalion. He accompanied Colonel Cavaignac in the expedition of Ouaren Senis, and formed part of the column under the direction of General Bonjol, who, after attacking the Flitbas, made some bold excursions in the country of the Kabyles of Garboussa. Everywhere the 3rd and 5th battalions of Chasseurs were led by the commander, Canrobert, with singular success. He had been an officer of the Legion of Honour for two years when Colonel de St. Arnaud, who, in 1845, succeeded Colonel Cavaignac in the command of Orleansville, employed him against Bou-Maza. The chief of the 5th battalion gave glorious co-operation in the affairs of Babl, Oued-Metmour, Oued-Gri, and Oued-Senzig. In the former he succeeded with 250 bayonets in keeping at bay more than 3000 men, who could not break his ranks. For this exploit he was appointed Lieutenant-Colonel on the 26th of October. He was soon afterwards closely blocked up in the town of Tenez, where he had succeeded Colonel Clapartide. Eight months of continual struggles brought about the pacification of the country, and the superior officer to whom this result was due obtained the rank of colonel upon the scene of his conquests.

After having commanded the 2nd Regiment of the Line, he entered the 2nd of the Foreign Legion on the 31st of March, 1848, and occupied Batina. General Herbillon intrusted him at this period with the command of a strong column, with orders to attack and intimidate the mountaineers of the Aures. This order was promptly executed. Colonel Canrobert surprised the enemy at the fort of Djebel-Chella, defeated him, drove him, sword in hand, as far as Kebech, in the Auer-Krahon, and made prisoner of the Bey, Ahmed. On his return to Batina he went to Aumale, and took the command of the regiment of Zouaves. In this new post he had again occasion to act vigorously against the Kabyles and the tribes of the Jurjura, whom he succeeded in reducing to submission.

But it was particularly in 1849 that Colonel Canrobert displayed an energy above all eulogium. The cholera attacked the garrison of Aumale, whom the events taking place at Zaatcha had led under the walls of that place. What courage, what presence of mind were requisite in the commander of the Zouaves, who thus conducted his soldiers in the midst of the dangers of a daring march, and compelled unceasingly to be the painful witness of their pain! He was everywhere exhorting the sick, attending to their wants; and, in passing, he sent a reinforcement to the town of Bou Sahn, the garrison of which was blockaded, and deceived the enemy, who blocked the passage, by announcing that he brought the plague with him, and that he should infect his assailants. At length he arrived at Zaatcha, on the 8th of November. On the 26th, he commanded, with most daring courage, one of the attacking columns. Out of four officers and sixteen soldiers who followed him to the breach, sixteen were killed or wounded by his side. As a reward for his conduct, he was appointed Commander of the Legion of Honour, on the 11th of December, 1849.

After having again distinguished himself at the battle of Narah, he was promoted to the rank of general of brigade on the 13th of January, 1850, came to Paris, commanded a brigade of infantry there, and was attached in the quality of aide-de-camp to the Prince President of the Republic, and appointed general of division on the 14th of January, 1853, at the time retaining his functions as aide-de-camp to the Emperor. Three months afterwards he was appointed to command a division of infantry at the camp of Helfaut, and almost at the same time he was selected as inspector of the 5th arrondissement of that force. Placed latterly at the head of the 1st Division of Infantry of the army of the East, he took a most active part, after the commencement of that war, by preparing the difficult operation of landing, and by powerfully co-operating in the victory of the Alma, where he could duly appreciate him, had the Marshal de St. Arnaud, who could duly appreciate him, had the most entire confidence in his talents and bravery. It is true that the young general had neglected nothing in order to merit that confidence. Before his departure he devoted himself to deep study respecting the scene of the present expedition, as if he had had the presentiment of his future destiny.

Such is the general officer for whom is reserved the honour of planting the French flag on the walls of Sebastopol; for he will not fail to realise the brilliant hopes which the glory of his antecedents suffice to excite in regard to his future.

THE BRITISH GENERALS IN THE CRIMEA.

Mr. Henry Stooks Smith, of Leeds, the compiler of The Regimental Lists of the British Army, has just issued the following outlines of the services of the different Generals now in command of British troops in the Crimea. SOLDIERS' WIVES AND FAMILIES.

IMPORTANT MEETING AT THE CALEDONIAN ASYLUM.

On Monday, Oct. 23, a special general court of the guardians of the Caledonian Asylum was held at the Scottish Hospital, Cranecourt. "To consider the necessity and duty of taking instant measures to make provision for admitting to the benefits of this national educational charity the orphan sons and daughters of Scottish soldiers, sailors, and marines killed (or disabled) in the glorious victory on the heights of Alma."

Sir J. H. MAXWELL presided. Dr. CUMMING said that the Caledonian Asylum was founded and intended originally to be restricted to the children of the brave soldiers, sailors, and marines who had fallen in the former war. Since that period the children of Scotchmen who were not in the army or navy had been admitted. But now the crisis had again arisen when they must revert to the original intention of the charity. He thought they should meet the crisis boldly—that they should show they were not effete and obsolete, but up to the age in which they lived, and ready to respond to the appeal made to them from the Alma and the heights of Sebastopol. (Hear, hear.) On looking over the reports of the killed and wounded, it appeared that a great preponderance of them were Scotchmen, and it was to be feared that many more of them would fall before the great object of their mission was achieved. They should therefore come before the public with a bold and liberal proposal. What he intended then to propose was simply this—"That this court, while expressing its thankfulness and joy at the glorious victory gained on the 20th of September, at Alma, in the Crimea, and not a little at the distinguished part taken by their Scottish countrymen in that severe struggle, yet cannot but deeply deplore the great sacrifice of the lives of gallant men, and the sufferings thereby entailed on their wives and children. That in order to show at least the anxious desire of the court to do what it can to express their sense of obligation and gratitude to the wounded and fallen, it is hereby resolved to empower the monthly court of directors to admit, at once, and without touching the claims of present applicants twenty-five children, boys and girls, of Scottish soldiers, sailors, and marines, either wounded, disabled, or killed in her Majesty's service in the East." This resolution, supposing it to be carried, he would follow up by another, to the effect that this resolution of the court be inserted in the London daily papers, and in the principal newspapers in Scotland, urgently asking for donations and subscriptions to carry out the object expressed in it. Supposing they did not get a single shilling, they would stand thus. Their present staff was sufficient to meet an addition of 130 more children without any increase of expenditure on that head. Every child cost at a maximum £15 a year, which would be £375 a year for the 25 children, or £2,625 for seven years, which was the longest period they could be kept in the asylum. They had a capital of £13,000 in the funds, and though he should be the first to protest against intruding on that capital on ordinary occasions, yet when a great national crisis came on he thought it better to spend the £3,000 at once than spread it over a period of years. He was supposing that they did not get sixpence, but he was satisfied that they would get back the money, for Scotchmen when they gave, gave liberally. In that respect they beat the English hollow. The difficulty was to get them to move at all. (Laughter.) He felt sure that by acting as he proposed the charity would be raised in the estimation of all who were anxious to meet the crisis, and they would, at all events, have the satisfaction of having done their duty. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. G. BRADSHAW seconded the resolution.

Dr. HALLER said the institution was capable of accommodating nearly three times the number it contained at present. In England £7,000 had been raised in one week for medical assistance, and why should they fear in the present temper of the country that they would fail in raising a few thousands in the course of several weeks. If they put aside prudence and acted with energy, prudence would follow it. (Hear, hear.)

Lord KINNAIRD said that, as he understood that the children could not be admitted in the ordinary way till June next, and as they must overstep the bye-laws in one way or the other, he thought the best course was to admit the applicants at once. He had just come up from Scotland, and they knew that there was 400 widows of soldiers there who had fallen. The resolution was agreed to.

Lord KINNAIRD begged leave to propose that the court be authorised, at the monthly court of directors, to admit 100 children of Scottish soldiers, sailors, and marines, killed, wounded, or disabled, during the war, and that they be admitted to all the advantages of the institution.

The rate of admission was then altered, in conformity with what appeared the general wish of the meeting, to £52. 10s., and the resolution was then carried. The usual charge has been £105.

The CHAIRMAN desired to have his name put down for £100. (Hear, hear.) A vote of thanks to the chairman terminated the proceedings.

Manual.

THE ARCTIC EXPEDITION.

Intelligence which, says the Times, may be fairly considered decisive (1) has at last reached this country of the sad fate of Sir John Franklin and his brave companions.

Dr. Rae, whose previous exploits as an Arctic traveller have already so highly distinguished him, lauded at Deal yesterday, and immediately proceeded to the Admiralty, and laid before Sir James Graham the melancholy evidence on which his report is founded.

Dr. Rae was not employed in searching for Sir John Franklin, but in completing his survey of the coast of Boothia. He justly thought, however, that the information he had obtained greatly outweighed the importance of his survey, and he has hurried home to satisfy the public anxiety as to the fate of the long-lost expedition, and to prevent the risk of any more lives in a fruitless search. It would seem from his description of the place in which the bodies were found that both Sir James Ross and Captain Bellot must have been within a few miles of the spot to which our unfortunate countrymen had struggled on in their desperate march. A few of the unfortunate men must, he thinks, have survived until the arrival of the wild-fowl about the end of May, 1850, as shots were heard and fresh bones and feathers of geese were noticed near the scene of the sad event.

We subjoin Dr. Rae's report to the Admiralty, and a letter with which he has favoured us:—

The following is Dr. Rae's report to the Secretary of the Admiralty:—

Repulse Bay, July 29, 1854.

"Sir,—I have the honour to mention, for the information of my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, that, during my journey over the ice and snows this spring, with the view of completing the survey of the west shore of Boothia, I met with Esquimaux in Pelly Bay, from one of whom I learnt that a party of 'white men' (Kabloonans) had perished from want of food some distance to the westward, and not far beyond a large river containing many falls and rapids. Subsequently, further particulars were received and a number of articles purchased, which places the fate of a portion, if not all, of the then survivors of Sir John Franklin's long-lost party beyond a doubt—a fate as terrible as the imagination can conceive.

"The substance of the information obtained at various times and from various sources was as follows:—

"In the spring, four winters past (spring, 1850), a party of 'white men,' amounting to about forty, were seen travelling southward over the ice and dragging a boat with them by some Esquimaux, who were killing seals near the north shore of King William's Land, which is a large island. None of the party could speak the Esquimaux language intelligibly, but by signs the natives were made to understand that their ship, or ships, had been crushed by ice, and that they were now going to where they expected to find deer to shoot. From the appearance of the men, all of whom except one officer looked thin, they were then supposed to be getting short of provisions, and they purchased a small seal from the natives. At a later date the same season, but previously to the breaking up of the ice, the bodies of some thirty persons were discovered on the continent, and five on an island near it, about a long day's journey to the N.W. of a large stream, which can be no other than Back's Great Fish River (named by the Esquimaux Ootko-hic-lik), as its description and that of the low shore in the neighbourhood of Point Ogle and Montreal Island agree exactly with that of Sir George Back. Some of the bodies had been buried (probably those of the first victims of famine); some were in a tent or tents; others under the boat, which had been turned over to form a shelter, and several lay scattered about in different directions. Of those found on the island one was supposed to have been an officer, as he had a telescope strapped over his shoulders and his double-barrelled gun lay underneath him.

"From the mutilated state of many of the corpses and the contents of the kettles, it is evident that our wretched countrymen had been driven to the last resource—cannibalism—as a means of prolonging existence.

"There appeared to have been an abundant stock of ammunition, as the powder was emptied in a heap on the ground by the natives out of the kegs or cases containing it; and a quantity of ball and shot was found below high-water mark, having probably been left on the ice close to the beach. There must have been a number of watches, compasses, telescopes, guns (several double-barrelled), &c., all of which appear to have been broken up, as I saw pieces of these different articles with the Esquimaux, and, together with some silver spoons and forks, purchased as many as I could get. A list of the most important of these I enclose, with a rough sketch of the crests and initials on the forks and spoons. The articles themselves shall be handed over to the Secretary of the Hon. Hudson's Bay Company on my arrival in London.

"None of the Esquimaux with whom I conversed had seen the 'whites,' nor had they ever been at the place where the bodies were found, but had their information from those who had been there and who had seen the party when travelling.

"I offer no apology for taking the liberty of addressing you, as I do so from a belief that their Lordships would be desirous of being put in possession at as early a date as possible of any tidings, however meagre and unexpectedly obtained, regarding this painfully-interesting subject.

"I may add that, by means of our guns and nets, we obtained an ample supply of provisions last autumn, and my small party passed the winter in snow houses in comparative comfort, the skins of the deer shot affording abundant warm clothing and bedding. My spring journey was a failure in consequence of an accumulation of obstacles, several of which my former experience in Arctic travelling had not taught me to expect.—I have, &c.,

"JOHN RAE, C.F.,
Commanding Hudson's Bay Company's
Arctic Expedition."

"List of Articles purchased from the Esquimaux, said to have been obtained at the place where the bodies of the persons reported to have died of famine were found, viz.—

"1 silver table fork—crest, an animal's head with wings, extended above; 3 silver table forks—crest, a bird with wings extended; 1 silver table spoon—crest, with initials 'F. R. M. C.' (Captain Crozier, Terror); 1 silver table spoon and 1 fork—crest, bird with laurel branch in mouth, motto, 'Spero meliora'; 1 silver table spoon, 1 tea spoon, and 1 dessert fork—crest, a fish's head looking upwards, with laurel branches on each side; 1 silver table fork—initials, 'H. D. S. G.' (Harry D. S. Goodsir, assistant-surgeon, Erebus); 1 silver table fork—initials, 'A. M. D.' (Alexander McDonald, assistant-surgeon, Terror); 1 silver table fork—initials, 'G. A. M.' (Gillies A. Macbean, second-master, Terror); 1 silver table fork—initials, 'J. T.'; 1 silver dessert spoon—initials, 'J. S. P.' (John S. Peddie, surgeon, Erebus); 1 round silver plate, engraved, 'Sir John Franklin, K.C.B.'; a star or order, with motto, 'Nec aspera terrent, G. R. III., MDCCCXV.'"

"Also a number of other articles with no marks by which they could be recognised, but which will be handed over with those above-named to the Secretary of the Hon. Hudson's Bay Company.

"Repulse Bay, July, 1854."

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—As any information, however meagre, regarding Sir John Franklin and his party must be of deep interest to every one, I take the earliest opportunity of communicating the following particulars:—

During my journey from Repulse Bay this spring over the ice, with the view of completing the survey of the west coast of Boothia, I then and subsequently obtained information, and purchased articles of the natives, which prove beyond a doubt that a portion (if not all) of the then survivors of Sir John Franklin's long-lost and ill-fated party perished of starvation in the spring of 1850, on the coast of America, a short distance west of a large stream, which, by the description given of it, can be no other than Back's Fish River.

Among the articles purchased (all of which are now in my possession), which the Esquimaux found where the corpses of the "white men" were discovered, are a small silver plate, with "Sir John Franklin, K.C.B.," engraved upon it, several silver spoons and forks, with initials of the following officers—viz., Captain Crozier, Lieutenant G. Gore, Assistant-Surgeon A. McDonald, Assistant-Surgeon J. S. Peddie, and Second-Master G. A. M. Bern.

Further particulars on this melancholy subject will appear in my report to the Hon. Hudson's Bay Company.

I may add that my small party wintered in snow-houses comfortably enough at Repulse Bay, after some very hard work in the autumn in laying up a supply of venison and fuel. We returned to York Factory all well on the 30th of August, but without having completed the contemplated survey.—I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your very obedient servant,
JOHN RAE, M.D.,
Commanding Hudson's Bay Company's
Arctic Expedition.

Ship Prince of Wales, in the English
Channel, Oct. 20.

P.S. We have had a very rough passage of thirty-one days from York Factory, saw a great quantity of ice in Hudson's Straits, and in a storm in the Atlantic split three or four of the principal sails, and very nearly had the life-boat washed away. I fear the season has been a most trying one for the ships in the far north.

Dr. Rae adds, that from what he could learn there is no reason to suspect that any violence had been offered to the sufferers by the natives. It seems but too evident that they had perished from hunger, aggravated by the extreme severity of the climate. Some of the corpses had been sadly mutilated, and had been stripped by those who had the misery to survive them, and who were found wrapped in two or three suits of clothes. The articles brought home by Dr. Rae had all been worn as ornaments by the Esquimaux, the coins being pierced with holes, so as to be suspended as medals. A large number of books were also found, but these not being valued by the natives had either been destroyed or neglected. Dr. Rae has no doubt, from the careful habits of these people, that almost every article which the unhappy sufferers had preserved could be recovered, but he thought it better to come home direct with the intelligence he had obtained than to run the risk of having to spend another winter in the snow.

SIR E. BELCHER'S ARCTIC SQUADRON.

The crews of the Assistance discovery ship, Captain Sir Edward Belcher, C.B., the Resolute discovery ship, Captain Henry Kellett, C.B., the Investigator discovery ship, Captain Robert J. L. M. McClure, the Pioneer screw-steam tender to the Assistance, and Intrepid screw-steam tender to the Resolute, were paid off at Woolwich on Tuesday, on their return in the Phoenix steam-screw sloop and North Star and Talbot store-ships from the Arctic regions. Captain Sir E. Belcher, Captain Kellett, Commander Richards, Commander Osborne, of Sir Edward Belcher's expedition, and Captain McClure, of Captain Collinson's expedition, with almost all the officers of the five vessels, and a brother of Captain Collinson, the still absent navigator, were in the dockyard for several hours on Tuesday while the men were being paid. The crews all looked remarkably well, and none more so than the men of the Investigator, who had been longest in the Arctic regions, having joined that ship in December, 1849, for the purpose of proceeding through Behring's Straits in search of Sir John Franklin and his companions. The ship's company of the Investigator subscribed seventy guineas for their surgeon, Dr. Armstrong, and, immediately on being paid off, a deputation of ten of their number proceeded to the Ship Hotel and presented to him, in the presence of a number of his brother officers, a gold chronometer and gold chain, valued at seventy guineas, as a testimony of their sincere respect and affection during their five years' arduous service while discovering the North-West Passage. The gift was handed to Dr. Armstrong, with an appropriate address, signed by each man, which was answered by Dr. Armstrong in a neat speech. The men then turned round to Lieutenant Bedford Pim, and said:—"If it had not been for you, Sir, many of us now present would never have seen old England again. All of us look upon you as a deliverer, and we shall never forget the joy we felt when you reached us." Lieutenant Pim answered:—"Thank you, my lads; I shall never forget our meeting. I congratulate you on your having escaped a similar fate to that of Sir John Franklin. I hope you will now enjoy yourselves to your hearts' content, and next spring I dare say we shall meet again under the walls of Cronstadt—perhaps in St. Petersburg itself."

The Phoenix screw-steam sloop, Captain Edward A. Inglefield, at Woolwich, was paid off on Wednesday.

ADMIRAL DUNDAS AND THE TIMES.

The son of Admiral Dundas has addressed the following letter to the editor of the Times:—

"Kintbury Vicarage, Hungerford, Oct. 24.

"SIR,—Admiral Dundas's character, as an officer, has been attacked in your leading articles, and the letters of your correspondents, with such persevering venom, that people begin to suspect there must be some private motive.

"Your honourable correspondent from her Majesty's ship Agamemnon, I leave in the hands of Sir E. Lyons and his officers, who will, my doubt, teach the learned gentleman that although in the House of Commons personal invectives may pass unnoticed, there is still a code of honour among the officers of her Majesty's navy which excludes the slanderer from their society.

"Now, Sir, I do not complain of a journalist publishing letters, even should they emanate from an attaché to the British Embassy, or the open enemies of the party asailed; but I do consider it a gross act of injustice when a paper of your vast influence attacks the character of an officer in a leading article, founded upon mere rumour.

"As the editor of a newspaper, your object ought to be to promulgate truth, and not to injure an honourable man's name, by publishing anonymous libels and ward-room gossip.

"Let facts alone be stated, and I fear not the people of England will find that Admiral Dundas has acted throughout to the satisfaction of the Lords of the Admiralty, Admiral Hamelin, his senior officer, and the generals of the allied army, under whose approbation all the movements of the fleets have been guided. My object in addressing you is to claim fair play for an absent man, a demand all honourable men will join me in making for my father.—Believe me to remain, your obedient servant,

"JAMES W. DEANS DUNDAS."

The following is the reply:—

"Printing House-square, Oct. 24.

"The Editor of the Times presents his compliments to Mr. Dundas, and begs to assure him that his father shall receive all the 'fair play' that even his son can 'claim' at his hands.

"As to the 'private motive' of which Mr. Dundas writes, the Editor is aware of none but a strong desire to put the most favourable construction upon the conduct of an old acquaintance, from whom he has received many civilities, and generally on that of every officer holding so responsible a post.

"Mr. Dundas invokes the 'code of honour among the officers of her Majesty's navy' against the correspondent who writes from her Majesty's ship Agamemnon.

"The Editor is content to leave him under the jurisdiction of the same code, equally confident with Mr. Dundas of a directly opposite conclusion.

"Mr. Dundas need not be informed that the acts of an admiral to whom is entrusted a principal share in one of the greatest expeditions of modern times, are necessarily amenable to public criticism.

"Nothing which has ever appeared in the Times has overstepped the fair limits of such criticism, and Mr. Dundas may rest assured that nothing will ever appear which will deserve from less partial judges such epithets as 'persecuting venom,' or 'continued abuse.'

"The Rev. J. W. D. Dundas."

SUNDERLAND.—WAGES.—A large number of shipwrights are on strike, owing to their employers giving them notice to reduce their wages from 6s. to 5s. per day. Several of the builders have their men on at the former rate, being compelled to finish their ships by a certain time. The ship joiners are also on strike for the same cause as the shipwrights.

TWENTY-SIX HOURS' AT SEA ON A RAFT.

The following statement is from Peter McCabe, who was wrecked with the Arctic, and is the only individual, so far as known at present, saved from the raft. Among all the recorded instances of physical endurance, it would be difficult to find one more remarkable than that presented by the case of Peter McCabe, who, after twenty-six hours' exposure on a frail raft, was rescued by Mr. Dorian, the third mate of the ill-fated Arctic. McCabe is a native of Dublin, Ireland, and is about twenty-five years of age. He has a fine ingenious expression of countenance, and has altogether the appearance of a man who, even under the most discouraging circumstances, would hope on to the last. One of his feet is in a horribly lacerated condition, large pieces of flesh having been torn from it by rubbing against the raft, laying the bone in many places quite bare. The skin has also been torn from his fingers, and both of his hands have a pained appearance. He says:—

"We left Liverpool on the 20th of September, and up to Wednesday, the 27th, nothing particularly worthy of note occurred. About twelve o'clock on that day, when we were about forty miles off Cape Race, and enveloped in a fog, we came in collision with some unknown vessel, which was afterwards, however, found to be a propeller. The Arctic was running at the rate of thirteen knots an hour, but the collision appeared so slight that no one on board, not even the captain, supposed that the damage was so extensive. His fears were only excited by the condition of the other vessel, which it was believed must be in a sinking state. Immediately after the collision the propeller passed us on the starboard side, when it was discovered that her bows were completely stove in, and that she was otherwise extensively damaged. Our course was instantly reversed by orders of the captain, and we went in pursuit of the vessel, for the purpose of rendering her all the assistance in our power, little imagining that we were so much in need of it ourselves at the time. On coming up with the propeller, we passed twice round her, and then saw between two and three hundred people on her deck. By order of Captain Luce, one boat, containing the first officer, Mr. Gourlie, the boatswain, and four or five sailors, was sent to her relief; but before they returned he ascertained the fearful extent of the damage to our own vessel. The propeller had struck her with terrible force, making a large hole in her starboard bow, through which the water was pouring in a torrent. Soon after the collision, I, with others, rushed upon deck, having no apprehension, however, as to our safety; but in a very short time we were made aware of the terrible reality. The boat arrived from the propeller, but Captain Luce refused to take the men on board, as he knew they could be of no assistance, and that it was better to keep them in readiness to receive the passengers. The firemen and engineers, driven from their post by the water, now came upon deck, increasing the number of the terror-stricken crowd.

"Every one now prepared himself for the worst. The life-preservers were brought into requisition, and a portion of the crew set themselves to work in the construction of rafts. The two fore-yard arms were cut down and lashed together, making a raft about forty feet long and three or four feet wide. I was engaged with the rest in making this raft, and Mr. Dorian, the third mate, took a most active part in the work. When it was finished, we launched it on the larboard side, and in a few minutes after there were about seventy persons clinging to it, four of whom were women. Several other rafts were made, but none of them so large as that on which I was engaged. Doors, barrels, and, in fact, everything that floated, was used. On some of these there were two and three, but the largest could not support more than four or five.

"I remained on the vessel till she sank, when I went down with her. I had been employed a few minutes before with two others—one of them was called 'Tom, the storekeeper'—in lashing some casks together, when I was driven away by the water, which was now rushing in with fearful impetuosity. Jumping upon the paddle-box, I sprang on the saloon deck, and in an instant was engulfed in the surging waters, which soon closed over our heads. Down, down we sank with our noble vessel into the bosom of the ocean, and the terrible thought took possession of my mind that I was drowning; that I should never see my dear friends and my home again. I retained my consciousness, however, all the time I was under the water, and it was with a feeling of intense joy that I found, after about half a minute, that I was rapidly rising towards the surface. It was all darkness before, but now I could see a dim light above me, and in a few seconds I was on the top of the water, struggling for life. Being a good swimmer, and having, besides, the support of a life-preserver, I succeeded in reaching a door, which was floating a few feet from where I rose. I looked around me, but there was no trace of the vessel except a few loose timbers and the rafts which were floating about, some with, and others without passengers. Finding I could not retain my hold of the door with safety, I left it, and swam to a barrel which lay a few feet from me; from this again I swam to the large raft which had, as I have said, about seventy persons clinging to it. The sea, though not strong, was rough, and the waves, as they dashed over it, washed away a portion of its living freight. I shall never forget the awful scene. There we were, in the midst of the ocean, without the slightest hope of assistance, while every minute one or more of our unfortunate fellow-passengers were dropping into their watery grave from sheer exhaustion. Those who had life-preservers did not sink, but floated with their ghastly faces upwards, reminding those who still remained alive of the fate that awaited them.

"In the midst of all this, thank heaven, I never lost hope, but retained my courage to the last. One by one I saw my unfortunate companions drop off; some of them floated off, and were eaten and gnawed by fishes, while others were washed under the raft, and remained with me till I was rescued. I could see their faces in the openings as they were swayed to and fro by the waves, which threatened every moment to wash me off. The raft at one time was so crowded that many had to hold on by one hand. Very few words were spoken by any, and the only sound that we heard was the splash of the waters or the heavy breathing of the poor sufferers, as they tried to recover their breath after a wave had passed over them. Nearly all were submerged to their arm-pits, while a few could with great difficulty keep their heads above the surface. The women were the first to go. They were unable to stand the exposure more than three or four hours. They all fell off the raft without a word, except one poor girl, who cried out, in intense agony, 'Oh, my poor mother and sisters!'

"When I was about eighteen hours on the raft there were not more than three or four left. One of these gave me what appeared to be a snail map, but which I understood him to say was a sort of title-deed to his property. In a few moments after I took it he unloosed his hold, and was added to the number that floated about the raft.

"I endeavoured to get the paper into my pocket, but found this impossible, on account of my cramped position; so I placed it between my teeth, and held it there till I was overwhelmed by a wave, when I lost my hold of it, and it was washed away. Another, who had an oiled silk coat on, called on me, for heaven's sake, to assist him, as his strength was rapidly failing, and he must fall off if not relieved. As he was about four or five feet from me, it was difficult to reach him; but after considerable exertions I succeeded in doing so, and helped him with one of my knees until I became quite faint, when I was obliged to leave him to his fate. Poor fellow, he promised me if ever he got to New York alive, he would reward me well. He clung with terrible tenacity to life; but he, too, dropped off in his turn.

"I was now left alone on the raft; not a solitary being was alive out of seventy; but still my hope continued strong. The night of the second day was about closing on me, and during the whole time I had been in the water I had not eaten a particle of anything, or drunk a drop. My strength I found was beginning to give way, and my sight had become so dim that I could not perceive objects a few feet off; even the ghastly faces of the dead, that looked up at me from under the raft, were hardly discernible. I determined on making one more effort for life; I raised myself on my knees upon the raft, and through the dusk of the evening I saw, or thought I saw, a vessel. My strength seemed to revive, and in a few minutes I heard the voices of persons in a boat approaching me. Ten minutes more and I, too, would have gone; but Providence had mercy on me, and after twenty-six hours' exposure, I was, by its mercy, preserved from a watery grave. The boat, I afterwards learned, belonged to the Huron, and was manned by Mr. Dorian, the third mate of the Arctic, Captain Grann, one of the passengers, and some sailors. One of the men caught hold of me by the collar, and dragged me into the bow of the boat, where I lay in the last stage of exhaustion till I was transferred on board the Huron, from which vessel I was placed on the Lebanon, and finally on the pilot-boat Christian Berg, on board of which I arrived at this port."

CRICKET.

To the Editor of THE FIELD.

SIR,—With regard to your correspondent's observation on what I wrote a short time since, I would observe that, in speaking of the player who brought an over-sized bat to play with, I used exactly the ideas the editor conveyed, and as he does not say that the batsman was not allowed to take his innings, I did not feel inclined to write so. Your correspondent hardly can be understood by some, for an iron stand, of which he speaks, is a very odd concern to be used for its purpose he mentions. He had better refer and give us its proper name; we will then be satisfied.—Yours, &c., W. R.

THE VALE OF AYLESBURY CRICKET CLUB.

To the Editor of THE FIELD.

SIR,—The doings of this club this year are very desultory; they heating a club which is known as a very strong team, and then losing a game with a small village. Aylesbury has always been celebrated for good cricketers, so that the young players could never show their faces in the field for play amongst the old clubs; so some young members met, to start a cricket club at the Bell Hotel, consisting of Messrs. R. and H. Gurney, R. Fowler and others, when it was resolved that the three above named should be stewards, that Mr. Thomas Thorpe should be the treasurer, and Mr. T. Picken the secretary. Great difficulty was felt to find a field; at last, the stewards agree with Mr. Bill for his field, which, although a long distance from the town, was a fine place to play in. A challenge from King's Langley club was sent, and the first game was agreed to be played on Whit-Tuesday, the 5th of June, on Chipperfield common. The V.A.C.C. gentlemen, for this match, lost Poulton and Darvell, two of their best men. The King's Langley gentlemen were the first to take the bat, to the bowling of Jones and Wheeler. The bowling of Wheeler was indifferent, but the fielding was good, with the exception of White, who appeared not to take any interest in the game, missing three catches. The play of Grace was good, scoring 20; the play also of Mr. J. Soorey was good, making some fine leg-hits, scoring 29. There was much credit to S. Wotton, jun., for his good long stopping, one bye only being obtained. The whole inning amounted to 77. This was considered by the King's Langley gentlemen to be a small score, but the V.A.C.C. gentlemen only succeeded in scoring 16; this appeared to astonish the V.A.C.C., and they thought it was superior howling, but in the second innings it proved contrary. The King's Langley gentlemen seemed to think they had met a side of muffs. After a cold collation having been freely partaken of, Langley again came to the wicket, when the following doubles were obtained:—W. Wotton, 17; Darvell, not out, 39; Martin, 11; R. Wotton, 13; the whole inning amounted to 97; thus giving their opponents 174 to obtain. It was thought that it was an utter impossibility for the V.A.C.C. to obtain this number of runs, but they soon showed that they had a good man, Wheeler scored 67; scoring out of these 34 from 8 balls, making some very long and fine hits. R. C. Gurney also played well, scoring 22 in fine style, playing Grace's twisters forward and well; at the close of the game 4 wickets were to fall on 26 runs, but it was generally thought the V.A.C.C. would have lost. The return-match was fixed for the 21st of June; so, accordingly on that day, the above two sides met on the ground of the V.A.C.C. The Vale being strengthened by the slow howler Poulton, who, throughout the day, bowled well, and the Langley gentlemen could do nothing with them. The V.A.C.C. were first sent to the wicket, when they could not succeed to obtain any double numbers, Jones being the only person who obtained a double 17, and not out being added to his name; the whole inning amounted to 58. During the inning a great many catches were missed by the King's Langley. King's Langley then went in, but it was seen that they could not do anything with the "slows" of Poulton. The only double number was Betts's 13, and the whole inning amounted to 35; thus the King's Langley gentlemen were 23 behind. The V.A.C.C. then went to the wicket again, but this time they could stand the slow roundhand of Bone from Rickmansworth, and not a single double number was obtained. C. Wollen made some very fine catches in this inning. K.L.C. again went in, but could do nothing, and were eventually beaten by 18 runs. A pleasant game was never played, nor a better, and we can only say that both sides played as cricketers not to win, and in a gentlemanly way.

They then challenged the Birtton Cricket Club, and it was fixed to be played at Birtton. The morning was exceedingly wet, but cleared up a little about twelve, when they commenced; but it continued to rain throughout the day, which made it very bad for both sides. On the part of Birtton, they lost Watkins, their best man, and their bowler was not well; whilst, on the part of the V.A.C.C., they were enabled to bring their strongest team out. The only double numbers throughout the whole day on the part of Birtton was D. Elliott 16, and J. Elliott 12. On the part of the V.A.C.C., before three wickets had fallen they had headed their opponents, so that there was no chance for Birtton. It being wet was very much against the Birtton, as their roundhand bowler could not command the ball. The double numbers on the V.A.C.C. were R. Gurney 34 and Darvell 10. The game eventually ended in Birtton being defeated by 8 wickets to fall. The return match was played at Aylesbury, when the V.A.C.C. had hardly time to bring up eleven, but Birtton would play on that day, not like cricketers, so that the V.A.C.C. only comprised five men, whilst the others were not worth having, so that this game needs no comment. Birtton again came to Aylesbury to have a conquering game, when they brought a strong side, the best that ever came from Birtton, in fact only two of these players came from Birtton. The bowling on the part of Birtton was good, whilst on the part of the V.A.C.C. it was decidedly bad; but it ought to be mentioned that the V.A.C.C. swift howler could not come, on account of the cholera, which made up the deficiency in the bowler on the part of Birtton. P. Hart scored double numbers of 27, 39, in hand for next year.

Yours, &c., COCHIN.

WENN CRICKET CLUB.

MARRIED v. SINGLE.

On Tuesday, the 10th ult., the return match between the married and single members of the Wenn Cricket Club was played on the Castle ground. J. H. Walford, Esq., kindly officiated as umpire, whose sound knowledge of the game enabled that gentleman to give his decisions with great promptness and accuracy.

The Married eleven were the first to handle the bat, and very steady was the play of Messrs. Buskin, Poole, and Weaver, who quickly placed a good round number to the married score. The Single were then called in, and seemed determined to make a stand, though it must be admitted the "innocent looking" bowling of Mr. Weaver was, as usual, very "insinuating." Mr. Dickinson made some capital "away hits," and the steady play of that gentleman and Messrs. J. H. Walford, Franklin, and Gough added greatly to rise the odds in their favour.

The steady batting of the Rev. J. Davies, and Messrs. Poole and Pugh in the second innings again "told tales" against their single opponents. Mr. Felton made a capital catch from the bat of Mr. H. Gwynn, and it was soon perceived that a breach had been made not easily filled up. Messrs. Dickinson, W. Lucas, Franklin, and Gough, however, in their second innings again played with a steady perseverance, endeavouring, if possible, yet to run up with their opponents; but fortune appeared still to smile on "the family men." Mr. Gough made a splendid one-hand catch, one of Mr. Weaver's favourite "drives" which would have otherwise have added some three runs to the married score, and at the fall of the wicket it was too evident that the married members had proved themselves "victors" by nineteen runs. The following was the score:—

TURFIANA.

DAKEITH.—The objection against this horse for the Welter Cup at the Warwick September Meeting, has fallen to the ground, it having been most satisfactorily proved that the horse was never entered as a "half-bred." Mr. West, his owner, accompanied by Mr. Gray, the clerk of the course at Newcastle-on-Tyne, attended at Tattersall's, on Monday last, and submitted the original entry of the horse to Mr. Greville, when it was instantly shown that no ground whatever existed for the objection against Dakeith on the ground of his having been run under a "fraudulent description."

Mr. H. Baker has named his brown yearling filly by Gameboy out of Maria, by Sir Hercules (the dam of The Dandy), Alma, and a bay colt foal by Cowl out of The Chicken's dam, Capuchin.

Count Branitskey's Zanoni (formerly Running Rein) died a short time ago, of inflammation of the lungs, in Russia. Jenny Lind (the dam of Hermit), also died, in the Count's stud in Russia, a week or two ago.

AGRICULTURE.

THE WARWICKSHIRE AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATION'S ANNUAL PLOUGHING, DRAINING, AND HEDGE-CUTTING MATCHES.

The Society fixed Friday, Oct. 6, for the above matches to take place. The ground selected was in the occupation of Mr. Hollic, and on the estate of — Brouley, Esq., in the parish of Baginbton. "The twenty-acre piece" being closer-ley was occupied by the ploughmen and soughers. There were sixteen of the former, and the same number of the latter. The hedge-cutting took place at the bottom of Borsall Meadow; there were twelve competitors, who each cut eight yards. The day was exceedingly unfavourable, being a cross between a Scotch mist and an English shower. The judges were Mr. E. Umbers, of Wappingbury, and Mr. Pearman. There was not such a large attendance as usual, owing to the weather, but nevertheless, many came from a long distance to the scene of action. The long continuance of dry weather rendered it a difficult task to make good ridges, but all performed their allotted task in a workman-like manner, with the exception of one of them, who lost the control of his horses during the first bout, thus rendering what should have been a straight line a deebled zig-zag; he very wisely quitted the field. The teams were all Gee-ho's, i.e., two horses abreast, and held with reins. Those sent by the Earl of Aylesford, a fine pair of light browns, were greatly admired, as were some splendid animals belonging to the Earl of Warwick.

PREMIUMS FOR THE BEST PLOUGHING.

By C. B. Adley, Esq., M.P., £5; by the Society, £5.

1. To the Ploughman who shall plough, in the best manner, a quarter of an acre, not less than six inches deep. To the first, £1; second, £3; third, £2; fourth, £1.
1st Prize of £1, to J. Summan, servant to Mr. J. Ashure.
2nd ditto of £3, to R. Dennis, servant to Mr. J. Ashure.
3rd ditto of £2, to J. Markman, servant to the Earl of Warwick.
4th ditto of £1, to J. Hancock, jun., servant to Lord Leigh.

Each of the above winners had a handsome silver presented to him in addition to his award in money. Thirteen tried.

By the Right Hon. the Earl of Aylesford.

2. To the Ploughman, under 18 years of age, who shall plough in the best manner the same quantity and depth, with two horses abreast, with a skid, and without a driver. To the first, £2; second, £1; third, 10s. There was only one competitor in this class, Charles Skidmore, servant to the Earl of Aylesford; and at the distribution of the prizes the judges remarked, "Considering he had done his work so well, they had agreed that he was entitled to the head prize," and awarded him £2 and the Society's medal, of which he appeared not a little proud.

3. To the Ploughman who shall plough the same quantity and depth with a skid, with two horses abreast, without a driver. To the first, £3; second, £2. There were only two in this class, consequently they were both winners.

1st Prize of £3, to J. Smith, servant to Mr. R. Hands, of Baginbton.
2nd ditto of £2, to J. Smith, servant to the Earl of Aylesford.

The Society's medal was also given in this case.

FOR HEDGING AND DITCHING.

By the Right Hon. the Earl of Warwick, £5; and the Right Hon. Lord Leys, £5.

To the Labourer in husbandry who shall perform eight yards of hedging and ditching in the best manner. To the first, £2; second, £1. 10s.; third, £1. 10s.; fourth, £1. 5s.; fifth, £1; sixth, 10s.; seventh, 10s.; eighth, 5s.

1st Prize of £2, to J. Gould of Wappingbury.
2nd ditto of £1. 10s., to W. Gould of Stullley.
3rd ditto of £1. 10s., to G. Gould of Brocton.
4th ditto of £1. 5s., to S. Gould of Stretton.
5th ditto of £1, to J. Puxton of Housham.
6th ditto of 10s., to T. Brancham of Housham.
7th ditto of 10s., to T. Brancham of Housham.
8th ditto of 5s., to T. Brancham of Housham.

Each of the above were presented with the Society's Medal. Four others tried.

SODDING PRIZES.

By the Right Hon. Earl of Leys, £5; by C. N. Newdegate, Esq., M.P., £5.

To the Labourer who shall cut not less than 14 yards of drain, 3 feet deep, and fit in pipe tiles, in the best and most efficient manner, and afterwards fill in the drains, regard being had to time. To the first, £2; second, £1. 10s.; third, £1. 10s.; fourth, £1. 5s.; fifth, £1. 10s.; sixth, 10s.; seventh, 10s.; eighth, 5s.

1st Prize, T. Ball, Cotton.
2nd ditto, J. Smith, Cotton.
3rd ditto, W. Smith, Cotton.
4th ditto, E. Cox, Radford.

With the Society's medal.

RUGBY AND DUNCHURCH PLOUGHING, DRAINING, AND HEDGE-CUTTING MATCHES.

The above trials of skill took place on Wednesday, October 1, on the estate of C. M. Caldecott, Esq., of Holbrook, in the parish of Long Lawford. The day was remarkably fine, and the company larger than for many years. Luncheon was provided at the George, upon a truly hospitable scale, for the farmers and their friends, and a huge round of beef, with abundance of home-brewed, was served in the field-barn, which had been cleared for the occasion, and to which the ploughmen, hedge-cutters, and drainers did ample justice. There were present J. A. Campbell, Esq., C. M. Caldecott, Esq., J. Atty, Esq., Mr. C. Norman, Mr. Black (steward to Lord J. Scott), Mr. H. Bailey, Mr. H. Hewett, Mr. H. Janaway, Mr. J. Crofts, Mr. Hipeck, Mr. J. Perkins, Mr. J. Reynolds, Mr. W. Haswell, Mr. B. Congrave, Mr. Spolus, Mr. T. Wirt, Mr. Whiteman, Mr. E. Bates, Mr. Friehure, Mr. H. Brouddell, Mr. J. Hawkins, Mr. J. Cowley, Mr. H. W. Cowley, &c. &c.

The ploughing took place in "The Church Close," in some closer-ley. The ground, owing to the long drought, was very hard, and rendered courses very rough and difficult to make good work of, but the men all did their work admirably. They started at half-past eight, and had finished their half-acre by half-past one. There were twelve competitors altogether, and consisted of two classes:—

FARMERS OR FARMERS' SONS.—Mr. George Janaway, of Brownsover, first prize; Mr. John Newcomb Norman, Harborough Magna, second prize.

PLOUGHMEN.—There were nine in this class, who had the option of having either two horses abreast and no driver, or three horses at length with a driver—not above fourteen years old. The first prize was awarded to John Gillins, ploughman to Mr. J. Lawrence, of Cawston. It was stated on the ground that the pair of horses who won the prize had carried away twenty prizes. The winner of the second prize was T. Prestage, ploughman to Mr. T. Waller, of Newbold Grange. The next best was G. Hawes, ploughman to Mr. T. C. Wats, of Walsdon; and the fourth best was T. Garratt, ploughman to C. M. Caldecott, Esq., of Holbrook Grange. The judges were puzzled how to decide, owing to the equality of the work.

DRAINING.—Eight were entered for the draining—to cut sixteen yards long and three feet deep; and the manner in which the men did their work elicited the admiration of all. The wonder was how they could possibly wedge themselves into a cutting not more than ten inches at the top and three inches at the bottom, and yet do their work so true. The three head prizes were awarded to R. Reading, by C. M. Newdegate, Esq., M.P.; namely, W. Smith, T. Hall, and J. Smith. The fourth prize was given to T. Turrall, sent by Lord John Scott.

HEDGE-CUTTING.—Only five men competed for these prizes—each to cut sixteen yards of a regular bulldozer, which many a hedger and ditcher well-mounted declared would pound many a crack fox-hunter before the season was over. The first prize was awarded to R. Reading; the second to J. Gould; the third to W. Holt. The judges were W. White, of Bourton, Mr. J. Downing, of Cawston, and Mr. G. Dalton, of Newham.

After the business of the day, a party, consisting of the committee and some friends dined together at the Eagle Hotel, and descended upon the merits of the different work performed; the breed of cattle; the probable price of wheat; the Russian war, and as to how Nicholas would be cut up after losing Sebastopol. The chairman, C. M. Caldecott, Esq., appeared in his usual funny mood, and the meeting passed off right merrily.

SOLIDIFIED MILK.—The last number of the American Medical Monthly contains an account of a visit made by a committee of medical gentlemen appointed by the New York Academy of Medicine, to the establishment of Mr. Blatchford, at Armenia, in the state of New York (some thirty miles east of Poughkeepsie), where "solidified milk" is prepared. The process of solidification is thus described:—"To 112 lbs. of milk, 28 lbs. of Stuart's white sugar were added, and a trivial proportion of bi-carbonate of soda, a teaspoonful, merely enough to ensure the neutralising of any acidity, which, in the summer season, is exhibited even a few minutes after milking, although inappreciable to the organs of taste. The sweet milk was poured into evaporating pans of enamelled iron, embedded in warm water heated by steam. A thermometer was immersed in each of these water-baths, that, by frequent inspection, the temperature might not rise above the point which years of experience have shown advisable. To facilitate the evaporation, by means of blowers and other ingenious apparatus, a current of air is established between the covers of the pans and the solidifying milk. Connected with the steam-engine is an arrangement for stirrers, for agitating the milk slightly whilst evaporating, and so gently as not to churn it. In about three hours the milk and sugar assumed a pasty consistency, and delighted the palates of all present. By constant manipulating and stirring it was reduced to a rich creamy-looking powder; then, exposed in the air to cool, weighed into parcels of a pound each, and by a press, with the force of a ton or two, made to assume the compact form of a tablet (the size of a small brick), in which shape, covered with tin-foil, it is presented to the public. Some of the solidified milk, which had been grated and dissolved in water the evening previous, was found covered with a rich cream. This, skimmed off, was soon converted into excellent butter. Another solution was speedily converted into wine, by a treatment precisely similar to that employed in using ordinary milk. It fully equalled the expectations of all, so that solidified milk will hereafter rank among the necessary appendages of the sick room. In fine, this article makes paps, custards, puddings, and cakes, equal to the best milk; and one may be sure it is an unadulterated article, obtained from well pastured cattle, and not the produce of distillery slops; neither can it be watered.

LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

RACING.

"On the green, green turf."

MR. EDITOR,—Newmarket Heath has been the scene of some very good sport throughout the week. The Houghton, or, as it has been not inaptly termed, "the hay and straw" meeting, commenced on Monday, and will not reach its conclusion till an hour or so before sunset to-morrow; an additional race—a second Nursery Stakes—having been provided to wind up the affair with spirit. It must be admitted that some of the principal features were comparative failures; but, nevertheless, a kind of recompense was found in the closeness of many of the contests, in which smart running and excellent jockeyship were frequently displayed. A monster field, as in the Widow's year, might not have been looked for; but, certainly, nineteen starters for the Cambridgeshire was a lamentable falling off from what most of us have witnessed. The Handicap bore an ugly look from the first, and its ill fortune continued to the last.

Nathan opened the ball on Monday, by winning the Sweepstakes on the Criterion Course with ease. This son of Paragon has on more than one occasion made a capital master of the ceremonies, and really deserves the distinction of Baron Nathan. Guy Manning carried off another small Sweepstake over his favourite ground, the Ditch Mile. Lord Glasgow's Phylaxis colt defeated, as I said he would, the once famous Dervish. A Sweepstake of 10 sovs for two-year-olds led to a complaint against Basham by Alfred Day, who rode Merry Nun. The Stakes were, however, awarded by the Stewards, on the following day to Mr. Morris's colt, and the Merry Nun gained nothing by her opposition to Priestcraft. Polestar was attractive enough to make her almost the favourite against the field for the £50 plate, and justified the confidence of her friends by winning cleverly by a length. Para at 10 to 1 for the Criterion, defeated the crack, Rifleman, by a neck. I selected this pair; and one started with the odds on him, while the other proved the winner. Game-lad's running over the Cambridgeshire Course, for the £50 plate, was a surprise, but turned out no safe prognostic of success for his stable's victory in the grand fray. Tuesday was the important day, as it brought the long-talked-of Cambridgeshire to issue. The result every one knows. My choice was Hervine or Rattle. But another foreigner, hight Scherz, contrived to beat the unlucky Rattle by a head. Hervine, though heavily backed, did not show; and good as the young German's performance undoubtedly was, I am still inclined to doubt that he can give three years and 7lbs to the French mare. Helena, Stonehenge, Ianthe, and others on whom some money had been invested, were also in the list of "missing." Indeed, many of the proceedings connected with this race, not forgetting the late flight of the Early Bird, were anything but satisfactory to the public. But old Nancy still had charms for many, and the simpletons will have to pay for their admiration. It is on the cards that she may yet be made "a good thing" for the Chester Cup. One of the three that I picked out from the improbable division, Speed the Plough, finished third—and so ended the Cambridgeshire of '54, with its nineteen starters out of an acceptance of seventy-eight.

It is not my intention to encroach on your space by touching on the many items that occupied the first four days of the meeting. I shall briefly refer to those mentioned in my last letter. In the 200-sovs Sweepstakes for two-year-old fillies, I gave you Habana and Almond for first and second, which proved correct to the letter. I also predicted that Graculus, although telegraphed to be under orders for Newmarket, would prefer the comfort of home-quarters to the strife of head-quarters. My view was so far borne out by the result; but Cavalier, whom I preferred before the favourite, Claret, did not choose to make a fight of it, and the honours of victory were left to the Duke of Bedford's Pucieron. Despite his endless forfeits, it would look as if it were intended that this same Graculus should keep the post of honour for the Derby during the winter.

"When Crack meets Crack, then comes the tug of war," are, I believe, the words of the celebrated poet; but mine may prove equally applicable next May—

"When flat meets flat, then sounds the dirge of woe."

I was right with Pyrrhic and Hospodar in the brace of matches, and Oulston pulled me gallantly through in the 50 sovs Sweepstakes; but the Trapper showed the white feather for the across flat contest, and left Ivan to dispose of Phylaxis colt as he pleased.

Worcester and Epsom put forth their autumnal attractions next week, and both give promise of some tidy sport. Worcester takes the Tuesday and Wednesday, while Thursday is devoted to the Metropolitan. As you may expect an opinion from me as to the probable results, I shall briefly observe that, for the WORCESTER HANDICAP, I must take Merry Bird, Sleeping Partner, and Cleveland, in the order named, although without much expectation of having succeeded in naming the winner.

THE FLYING STAKES has an entry of twenty-nine. In this half-mile spin, I am inclined to prefer the chances of the two-year-olds. Clinica or Gossip may accomplish the successful flight, though Falcon may bring both down; Katinka, too, should be handy.

HANDICAP SWEEPSTAKES for two-year-olds. One mile. Among the fourteen entered for this race, we find the name of Lady Tatton, who has just distinguished herself by winning the Nursery Stakes at Newmarket to-day. But as her ladyship may not like the selling condition of the Worcester counter, I am disposed to award encouragement to Poor Dick.

Wednesday introduces us to the Steeplechase and Hurdle-races. After the discouraging opening at Warwick, we can hardly expect much here; but let us hope that matters may soon mend. The "Grand Annual" boasts an entry of nine, and Needwood or Maurice Daley may furnish the victor.

THE HURDLE RACE includes thirteen names, the most likely, to my notion, being Freedom and Theodine.

With fine weather, Thursday is certain of witnessing a large number of visitors congregated on Epsom Downs.

THE EPSOM AUTUMN HANDICAP over the new Derby Course has been fortunate enough to secure thirty-one acceptances. Among them is to be found the Cambridgeshire winner, who was handicapped at precisely the same weight he carried at Newmarket; but the 7lbs penalty will, I apprehend, damage his chance. Defiance, Hungerford, The Trapper, Wild Huntsman, The Early Bird, Minceant, and others of celebrity, are among the "contents;" but my present fancy is for Little Harry, Ethelwolf, or Mishap.

THE BEDDINGTON STAKES, one mile, has an entry of twenty-nine young ones. Time will not permit me to run through the Handicap, but it strikes me that Palmerston and Gondoline may show improvement on former running.

THE BENTINCK PLATE is headed by Rattle at 8st 13lb, and I am inclined to think him good enough to carry home the weight; but as his starting may be doubtful, I shall take my venture with Speed the Plough, Noisette, and Bridesmaid.

Yours,

TOBY PEEPS.

Markets.

MONEY MARKET.

FRIDAY.—Consols closed officially $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. better than the opening at 94 $\frac{1}{2}$ for money, and 94 $\frac{1}{2}$ for November; but after discount hours there were sellers at 94 $\frac{1}{2}$. Reduced at 93 $\frac{1}{2}$ 93 $\frac{1}{2}$. New Three per Cents at 93 $\frac{1}{2}$ 93 $\frac{1}{2}$. Exchange Bills, 7s to 7s. premium. Exchange Bonds, 93 $\frac{1}{2}$ 100. Bank Stock, 212 213.

SMITHFIELD.

FRIDAY.—The number of beasts is larger than of late, but the quality of the supply very indifferent. Trade by no means brisk. The supply of sheep is small; the small amount of business transacted is at about Monday's rates. Good calves are in demand, at Monday's quotations.

MARK LANE.

FRIDAY.—The wheat market was quiet this morning. Flour underwent no change in value. Barley commands 1s. more money. Oats were 1s. dearer than on Monday. Beans and peas scarce, and fully as dear.

COUNTRY GRAIN.

Leamington, October 21.—The supply of wheat was but small; the excitement which has pervaded the trade all through the last ten days was equally shown at this market, and the advance on previous prices fully 8s. to 10s. per quarter. Barley was in good supply. The high prices demanded checked sales; but choice qualities fetched prices giving an advance of 3s. to 1s. per quarter upon last week's rates. Beans and peas scarce and dearer. We quote prices to the growers: Wheat, red, 71s. to 76s.; ditto, white, 78s. to 84s. per quarter; barley, malting, 34s. to 38s.; ditto, grinding, 30s. to 35s. per quarter; beans, 42s. to 46s. per quarter; peas, 42s. to 45s. per quarter. Averages for the week ending 21st October: Wheat, 2,219 quarters, at 57s. 2d; barley, 1,432 quarters, at 30s. 9d.; oats, 45s. quarters, at 27s. 10d.; beans, 5 quarters, at 45s.; peas, 34 quarters, at 38s. 9d.

SCARLEND, October 21.—The market this day was well supplied with grain, which was soon cleared off at an advance from 3s. to 4s. per quarter on wheat. Other sorts of grain were not much inquired after. Flour meets with a ready sale at 65s. per sack of 20 stones.

HOPS.

Boston.—The market is much firmer this week for new hops of good quality, with a tendency to advance; and present prices must be considered as moderate, when it is taken into calculation that our own growth is officially declared to be but £47,000, and it is believed that the imports of new cannot exceed £15,000.

TURF TALK.

"The chosen sport of a great and a free people."
OUR SAILOR KING.
THE SPORTING WALLET.
(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

All the great two-yr-old stakes having been run through now, and the Derby crack, Græculus Esuricus not having shown for any of his engagements, the question as to his being the horse, as rumour represents him to be, has been mooted in several good quarters. He has paid forfeit for eight stakes, worth, in the whole, £4,238—viz., the Seventh Triennial Produce Stakes of £470, at Newmarket, won by Rifleman; the Clearwell Stakes of £570, won by the Polydora colt; the Sixth Ascot Triennial Stakes of £470, won by Bonnie Morn; the Sussex Stakes of £150, at Goodwood, walked over for by Namur; the Fourth Bentinck Memorial Stakes, of £630, at Goodwood, won by Gretina; the Convivial Stakes of £628, at York, won by Rifleman; the Sixth Stockbridge Triennial Stakes of £620, won by Bounio Morn; and the Glasgow Stakes of £700, at Newmarket, won by Pugnator. It is true that in three of these stakes, his stable companion, the pony offshoot of the stock-getting Chanticleer, went to do battle in his stead; but surely the Convivial, Clearwell, and Glasgow prizes, to say nothing of the Goodwood couplet, were worth adding to the Streatham coffers! Of late there has been a strong inclination evinced, even by the staunchest of the Malton adherents, to transfer favour from this "hungry Greek" to the Miss Bowe produce, De Claro, and at the close of the recent Newmarket Congress the latter was in great force, ousting Græculus, whose decline was foreshadowed on the preceding Wednesday, by an opposition in a well-known quarter, and the simultaneous "upward tendency" of the ex-premier's half brother to Boiardo. On the Heath, there were other significant manifestations touching the Derby, some of which are even now gradually emerging from a chrysalis state. Eight were backed against the field for a cool thousand; Oulston, consequent on his cantering away from the Professor, advanced to 20 to 1; an even 2,000 laid between him and Wild Dayrell; and 40 to 1 taken very freely about one of Stevens's team, Frederick. Earlier in the week, we may also observe, 6 to 1 was taken about Rifleman and De Clare, coupled; and, subsequent to their defeat, 900 to 100 about The Cruiser and Rifleman, coupled. The Nailer, whom Mr. Arnold would not part with after all, together with another of young John Day's, the Prince of Wales, were introduced at 1,000 to 30 each. Ere long we certainly expect to see a lively agitation in the Derby speculation; and in a future number we shall have a few more comments to offer on the prospects afforded by that great event. Meanwhile, we may remark that the public running of the Surrey candidates has been anything but good, taken on the whole, and, unless the "dark" division turns out something better, or the present two-yr-old form is vastly improved upon, we shall have a worse lot next May than we had at the last summer tryst on the Epsom downs.

A great number of horses have latterly changed hands. Mr. Howard has purchased the whole of the Burleigh yearlings, with the exception of a couplet, one of which, a colt by Flatcatcher out of Cobnut's dam, the Earl of Chesterfield purchased for 290 guineas. We are glad to see that his lordship is augmenting his racing stock. Mr. J. Arnold's horses fetched but very small sums; The Nailer was not sold, therefore, and Saucebox fetched the highest price of the others, Mr. T. Parr becoming his owner for 155 guineas. Lord Lonsborough is gradually increasing his stud, and with valuable stock. He has given 1,000 guineas for Ivan, who has at last managed to win a race this season, after

Although a very large amount of money changing hands to-day, many accounts remain unclosed, and not a few are likely to be "wintered upon."

The results of the recent Houghton Meeting were, for the most part, unfavourable to the fielders. Several of them lost heavily. Some idea of the aggregate amount of loss may be gathered from the fact, that one book-maker alone has minus £16,000 on the transactions of the week. But, notwithstanding this state of affairs, speculation was resumed at intervals with a good deal of spirit.

Scherz was in great force for the Epsom Autumn Handicap, the odds varying from 2 to 1 to 6 to 4; Defiance had a few friends, and 10 to 1 was taken in fifties and ponies about Hungerford.

The Derby, 3,000 to 300 was taken in one bet about De Clare, and 600 to 500 laid three times between him and Rifleman; 1,200 to 100 taken about Graculus Esuriens; 600 to 50 St. Hubert, 300 to 25 Lord of the Isles, 1,500 to 100 Rifleman, and 4,000 to 300, in one bet about Wild Dayrell, who was backed altogether for £500; 1,000 to 25 was taken about Frederick, 1,000 to 20 and 4,500 to 100 about Westminster (by Touchstone), 1,000 to 20 about Prince of Wales, 1,000 to 20 Affghan, and 1,000 to 20 Polydora colt.

THURSDAY.

A blank day, in consequence of the meeting at Epsom.

MANCHESTER.—TUESDAY.

Since the return of the subscribers from Newmarket the settling has been the chief business, and as far as the "Ring" is concerned, the result of the Cambridgeshire Stakes has been lookably harmless, but as regards other events decided at Newmarket, the layers have been great sufferers, and, to add to their losses, the backers of horses—by being so backward in coming forward to settle—are to a great extent giving them cause to complain, which is too frequently the case at the close of the legitimate racing season. Of course some allowance on their behalf can be made for the unceremonious manner in which several horses were scratched for the Cambridgeshire Stakes, after for some time holding prominent positions in the betting; such proceedings generally having the effect of making settling bad on behalf of the backers, by causing them to invest upon horses that they otherwise would have no idea of backing. However, to insure stability in the market, prompt payments are indispensable.

As regards the coming steeplechase season, if we may judge from the remarks that we have already heard made by the layers of the odds, we are inclined to believe that very little money will be got out of them by the steeplechase fraternity during the coming exploits in that branch of racing. Scherz for the Epsom Autumn Handicap, run for to-morrow (Thursday), is backed at a very short figure, and is an immense "pot." Some inquiries were made about Little David, Little Harry, and Candlewick, but none of them were backed in our hearing, nor did we see a bet laid upon the Derby. Closing prices:—

WORCESTER AUTUMN MEETING.

Stewards: Viscount Elmley, M.P., F. W. Knight, Esq., M.P., Captain Rushout, M.P., J. H. H. Foley, Esq., M.P., O. Ricardo, Esq., M.P., W. Laslett, Esq., M.P., and Colonel Clowes.—Hon. Sec.: Mr. W. Webb.—Judge: Mr. R. Johnson.—Clerk of the Course: Mr. W. Tolley.—Starter Mr. G. Callaway.

Four ancestors could but contrast the racing of the present day with that of their own, they would indeed look upon us as a Miles nation. The Goodwood meeting alone would startle them with its 235 competitors and £18,222 clear, for the thirty-six winners. Still, the great Sussex gathering is an exception, for many of our old provincial turf-meetings have fruitlessly struggled against fate, of late years, to maintain a position. With all the energy and liberality which have been thrown into their respective managements, few have been able to keep up their head, to buoy up against the tide of difficulties.

Worcester, among the rest, has been almost overwhelmed by the flood of misfortunes; but a change has been effected within the last few years, and the Pitchcroft sports are destined hereafter to vie with the most successful of its country rivals. The rapidly-increasing prosperity of its summer meetings, in particular, has been most cheering. There has been an important also every successive season for the last half-dozen summer assemblies, the excess over 1849, in the first succeeding gathering, being £100 in stakes, and the second, £346, the third, £718, the fourth, £1,022, and the fifth, £1,149; whilst the increase of competitors over the 1849 string was, 38 in 1851, 43 in 1852, and 60 both last year and in the recent summer. The number of races, however, are more than double now. During the half-dozen meetings above referred to, 332 horses have competed, and £4,553 paid over to the 53 winners. The last July meeting on Pitchcroft was indeed a brilliant one for our Victorian friends, and was rendered doubly interesting and pleasing through the Worcestershire Stakes foreshadowing the great St. Leger result, the Knight of St. George gallantly achieving both conquests. The result, too, of the meeting drawing 86 horses to the Ham, was the more gratifying and surprising because the present racing season has not really been so successful as could be desired. There has been a proverbial deficiency in the attendance and competitors at the majority of the meetings, which could not fail to excite regret among old sportsmen. That the unhappy contest in the East has greatly militated against a more phasing result cannot be denied, for hundreds of old turfmen—owners of horses and general ring-patrons—have been compelled to exchange the arena of happiness and sport for scenes of strife and bloodshed. Perforce do we hope, however, that the period of their safe return is not far distant, and that the arts of civilisation and peace may long remain unimpeded in their progress and consummation by despotic rill and aggression. This unfortunate "drainage," as well as tightness in the turf-market, has so fully operated against the majority of the leading reunions.

Though there has been a marked falling off in the strength of the majority of the gatherings, it must not be considered for one moment that there has been anything approaching to a failure, or a decrease, either, in the national feeling for the sport. Decidedly not. On the contrary, this very deficiency of support to old meetings is actually to be attributed, independent of the above "drainage," to the constant and fervent rivalry of new aspirants to popularity, and the consequent division among owners of horses. Indeed, there are so many claimants to support, so many meetings held in the same week, and an uninterrupted succession of them, that it is really a wonder how the elder caterers maintain even the position they do. This mania, however, must give an additional impetus to breeders, and increase, at the same time, the national benefit. Last season no fewer than 1,942 different horses competed for stakes, on the flat, in England and Scotland alone; and this year, we are told, the immense string of 941 foals have been registered in the Stud Book, being an excess of 676 over the entry for the year 1850, and 329 more than the 1825 registry. In the course of a few more seasons, therefore, we may expect a considerable augmentation in racing stock. Meantime, we cannot be surprised at the temporary falling off at some of the reunions, particularly, too, at the "flag-end" of a campaign.

The November assemblies at the "faithful city" of Worcester have, however, steadily maintained their position, and, until recently, have even been better than the July insects; for, taking the corresponding summer meetings with the last five autumnal trysts, there is an excess of a dozen runners, and £1,856 in favour of the latter. This year there was an increase in the numerical strength and character of the entries for the flat race events, though a great diminution of support to the steeplechase and hurdle-race items. Still the gathering of Tuesday and Wednesday last was a very attractive one, the programme containing nine items, with £370 of added money. The official staff was unexceptionable, too, Mr. Richard Johnson, of York, occupying the judicial chair, and Mr. Topham adjusting the imposts. The duties of starter devolved, as usual, upon Mr. George Callaway, the ex-jockey, and who steered the non-popular Touchstone in triumph for the 1844 St. Leger. The attendance was strong, and we never recollect seeing the "figure of 8" course on Pitchcroft Ham in finer condition, a most lucky exception, for the horses are now have had to run through a lake of water there at this period of the year.

The racing on Tuesday opened at one o'clock with the Selling Stakes of £50 clear, for which the whole half-dozen ran that were entered. Songster, the hurdle-racer, was made the favourite, and Thrush also found a many staunch supporters, but Miniature defeated them very cleverly, after a good race in, triumphing by a neck; her victory, however, did not "take" with the public, and she was bought in at 21 sovs, the fund realising but a solitary "quid" by the auctioneer's efforts. One hour was then allowed prior to the juveniles showing for the Handicap of £25, on the mile, for which the Luc colt was considered a very "good thing;" he did not, though, reverse the Warwick running with Banbury, for the latter vanquished him by a clear half length, and was bought in for 62 1/2 sovs, the executive benefitting £15. 14s. by the sale. The principal event of the day, the Autumn Handicap of £286, enticed ten to the post, singularly the same number as were on the three last occasions, when the stakes were respectively worth £125, £273, and £264. For the third time in succession, to-day, there was a coup for the fielders, the Rataplan pot boiling over, and the horse never once showing conspicuously in the contest. Jack Leeming, of the stout Voltaire blood, won in a common canter, adding another to the strong list of winners Joseph Dawson has furnished this autumn. The "tailing" was great; and even before two-thirds of the distance was covered the horses were widely scattered, Cleveland being a long way astern, having, too, had a bad start. Seven were entered and started for the half-bred stake of £55, and Le Jui, piloted by J. Prince, whose return to the pigskin has been attended with good fortune, justified the confidence reposed in him, as he came right away from his competitors, and won in a common canter, Shakespeare again finishing second. Falcon, too, endorsed the judgment of the ring by winning the Flying Handicap of £175 remarkably easy, beating the strongest field of the day, and proving that the stable were not wrong in giving the long price they did, at Warwick, for his retention. During the day we had forty-seven runners, which was a dozen more than in 1849, twenty-five more than in 1850, eight more than in 1851, thirteen more than in 1852, and seventeen more than last season. This year £661 was paid to the five winners, the prizes in 1849, '50, '51, '52, '53, reaching £104, £186, £369, £509, and £460 respectively.

Though it is quite evident that steeplechasing is "under the weather," the proceedings on Wednesday last fully equal, in point of sport, the two preceding numbers of the kind on Pitchcroft Ham, notwithstanding the entries were so considerably diminished, there being seven nominations less for the Grand Chase than last year, and nineteen less than in 1852. Still it was the best entry of the present campaign, so far as it has gone, being two more than the Warwick array, five more than the Aberystwyth, one more than the Cowbridge, two more than the Liverpool, and three more than the Hylake. At Warwick, too, but three horses ran; here, although we had nine acceptors, only eight competed, the only absentee being Little Charley. For the Hurdle Race there were also eight starters, and among them were horses of a very fair class. Notwithstanding the encouragement given to the county sportsmen, the Hunt Chase does not seem to "take" with them; and the £50 annual gift (£30 of which is contributed by Major Clowes, the Master of the Worcestershire Hounds) is almost thrown away. The Selling Chase not filling, there were only three races run off to-day, but they brought a score runners to the post, and £130 clear was paid over to the successful candidates. The Hurdle Race of £85 was won by an outsider, ridden by Reuben Archer, a younger brother to the accomplished Will; but, after defeating the favourite, Jenny the Black (formerly known on the flat as The Surveyor), very easily, pulled up dead lame, having sprung a sinew in the effort at the final flight of timber. Young Oliver made his debut in this stake as a hurdle-race rider. Needwood, as fit as a fiddle, as all Ben Land's horses are at the commencement of a steeplechase season, was a strong favourite for the Grand Autumn Handicap of £280, as little as 5 to 4 being taken. The race, like the betting, lay between him and Spring, but he ultimately won in a canter. He is a grey horse, formerly called Honest Tom, and is by the Dean, (breed by Mr. B. Collett, in the county of Worcester) out of Fieldfare—the latter an Irish mare. A series of refusals gave Bastian an easy victory in his maiden steeplechase essay for the Hunt Chase of £70.

TUESDAY.

Selling Stakes of 6 sovs each, with 25 added. For three-yr-olds and upwards. Optional selling weights, &c. One mile and a quarter. 6 subs.

Mr. Waller's Miniature, 3 yrs (£20), 6st 2lb	Quinton	1
Mr. Shirley's Songster, 5 yrs (£20), 8st 4lb	Ashtun	2
Mr. J. Bilton's Donna, 3 yrs (£4 0), 6st 2lb	Oliver Jun.	3
Mr. H. Smith's Locket, 4 yrs (£20), 7st 6lb	Wells	4
Mr. Baker's Thrush, 4 yrs (£20), 7st 6lb	Charlton	5
Mr. Grubb's Astonishment, 3 yrs (£20), 6st 3lb, Carroll.

The whole of the half-dozen nominated came to the post, and, singular enough, each were entered to be sold for 20 sovs. The betting was rather brisk at 7 to 4 agst Songster, and 5 to 2 agst Thrush. At one time Miniature was backed at as little as 2 to 1, but 3 to 1 was obtainable at the close. Thrush and Astonishment came away with the lead; the remaining trio clustered at their heels to within three-quarters of a mile of home, when they closed, and almost at the same moment Astonishment, who had been running at Upton on the previous Friday, made a "bolt" out of the course. Miniature and Songster supplanted Thrush at the commencement of the straight, and were joined by Donna at the distance, a beautiful race between the three resulting in favour of the Portrait filly by a neck, the hurdle-racer defeating Donna for second place by a bare half length, Locket and Thrush finishing fourth and fifth, but separated two and three lengths from the third.

Handicap Sweepstakes of 5 sovs each, with 40 added. For two-yr-olds. Winners extra. The second horse to receive £10 out of the stakes. The winner to be sold for £50, &c. Rather more than one mile. 14 subs.

Mr. Saxon's Banbury, 7st 2lb	Clements	1
Mr. J. Osborne's by Chantleer, out of Ino, 7st 2lb, Ashtun		2
Mr. Penn's Forward, 7st 2lb	Wells	3
Mr. W. Huddards Myrtle, 7st 4lb	Kendall	4
Mr. John's May Day, 8st 2lb, Knight.
Mr. H. Land's Grey Chicken (the Tom Hinos), 8st, Land, Jun.
Mr. T. Barr's Equivoque, E. Foster

being second six consecutive times. Mr. Morris has parted with Kingston, too; and John O'Gaunt, the sire of Hungerford, has been purchased by Mr. Stebbings for 300 guineas.

The Easby Abbey breeding establishment has received an addition of four brood mares this week. Three of them are only two-yr-olds, and one, a descendant of Launcelot and Whim, has already been served by the honest old Collingwood. The other is an aged mare, Albion, who won the last Newmarket Town Plate. Mr. Jaques gave but £111 for the quartette. Mr. Blenkiron, who now owns Kingston, gave £200 for the inerrigible Exact, for the stud; Sam Rogers claimed her at Hampton for 300 guineas. By-the-bye, Sam's father died last week, aged 65.

The meetings for the coming week are Liverpool and Cambridge. The entries fall very short of their last year's strength. At Cambridge, thirteen accept for the Glamorganshire Stakes, on the flat, out of eighteen, and one of Mr. Parr's brace, Tower and Lord John, may probably take the proceeds to Benham House. The Steeplechase has a poor acceptance of seven, out of the eighteen entered. Theodine and Diana will doubtless have the finish to themselves. "Old Ben" is the most likely to triumph.

Notwithstanding the shortness of horses and the disheartening issues of the Warwick, Worcester, and Liverpool appeal, Oundle and Epsom are determined upon holding a steeplechase meeting this campaign. We hope they will think of the bona fide hunters. Miss Mowbray and British Ycoman are reported lame.

THE TRANSPORT SERVICE IN THE EAST.—The following extract from the letter of a Staffordshire officer communicates some particulars of interest:—"On board the War Cloud, Varua Bay, Sept. 29, 1854.—Here we are again at this horrid place." What we have gone through since we left it will be as painful to me to relate as it was to witness. On Sunday and Monday last, the 24th and 25th, I embarked in this vessel with my troop, and a portion of another troop under my command. On Tuesday, the 26th, we, that is to say, the heavy brigade, left Varua Bay in three divisions, under convoy of the Spiteful. Towards evening it began to blow heavily, and at midnight it increased to a regular hurricane. I was then called to go below, and was informed that the horses were down in all directions. I should tell you that we had 100 horses on board, though the space was only large enough to contain fifty-six, consequently it was impossible to secure them properly; and there were besides eighteen baggage animals between decks. I went below immediately, and saw a most horrid sight; nearly all the horses were down, many of them loose and some of them lying under some planks. I exerted myself to the utmost to get the horses up again; but all in vain, as the ship rolled more and more every moment, and it was with the very greatest difficulty we could prevent ourselves from falling in amongst the horses, which were screaming and kicking in all directions. I remained in the midst of this horrid scene more than four hours, expecting every moment to be kicked and trampled to death. At length the fitting in front of the horses gave way, and it became perfectly impossible to remain below any longer, and we were most reluctantly obliged to leave the poor horses to kick and strangle each other to death. When we came on deck again we found that this vessel had broken away from the Emperor steamer, which had been towing her, and we were left to the mercy of the wind and waves. I had hoped to go below the next morning to separate the living from the dead horses, but the gale still continued and we were obliged to leave them till yesterday, the 28th. When at last I was able to go below I saw the most horrid sight I ever beheld, in fact, it was quite sickening to see seventy-one dead horses heaped together and mangled in the most shocking manner, and my own three poor animals amongst them. With much labour and difficulty we at last got them overboard, but only just in time, as the stench was most disagreeable and dangerous. What is now to become of me and my troop I know not; I have only five horses left, and those much damaged. To-morrow we shall anchor inside the bay, and I shall go on and see what is to be done. I cannot now write more, as I am so over-set and disappointed at the great misfortune that has overtaken me."—Wolverhampton Chronicle.

THE BEAR AND THE HORSE.—Another alleged proof of the bear's sagacity is, that when he has seized a horse, and the terrified prey in his agony drags his foe after him, the bear, in order to stop the headlong speed of the affrighted horse, retains his hold with one paw, while with the other he firmly grasps the first tree they pass; when, owing to the enormous strength of his enemy, the poor horse is at once brought up, and at his mercy. It sometimes happens, however, that if the bush or tree grasped is only slightly embedded in the soil, it is torn up by the roots; when, for a second or two at least, the horse, the bear, and the tree may be seen careering together through the forest! Though in general horses, when attacked by the bear, make no resistance, but trust to their heels for safety, some are found who will stand gallantly on the defensive, and not unfrequently beat off the assailant. This was the case with a certain mare in Wermland, which was known to have come off victorious in numerous conflicts. But this animal exhibited extraordinary courage, as well as wonderful sagacity; for instinct telling her that her own soft heels would have but little effect on Bruin's iron carcase, she would not, after passing the winter in the stable, betake herself to the woods in the spring, until duly provided with shoes. But when the blacksmith had performed his part, feeling she was then prepared to meet the enemy on equal terms, she would trot off gallantly to the depths of the forest. I have also read of a mare at Wuollerim, in Jockmoeck's Lappmark, that was celebrated for thus combating wild beasts. For the mere fun of the thing, indeed, she herself would at times become the assailant. On one occasion she slaughtered three wolves which were prowling in company on a newly-frozen lake. Though I have never seen the horse in conflict with the bear or the wolf, I can well understand that he at times proves a formidable antagonist; for, independently of his heels (which with management may perhaps be avoided), his fore legs are most destructive weapons. About two years ago a horse thus attacked a valuable pointer of mine—a many-yr-old possible learnt in his combats with wolves—in the most savage manner. No dancing master could have brought his legs into play with more alacrity; and it was only by a miracle that the poor dog escaped destruction.—Scandinavian Adventures.

WRIGHT'S BOOK OF STEEPLCHASES.—W. A. Wright, of Woodstock, Holborn.—This useful manual makes its appearance at the right time. The "cross-country" work has now commenced, and all who take interest in the sport will find some valuable information in this clever compilation.

The Ino colt absorbed the whole attention of the ring, he being the only animal really backed, 5 to 4 being taken with avidity. 5 to 1 was offered on the field for the favourite, at which price Forward may be quoted, and Poor Dick at 6 to 1. The start was a good one, and the team came in a pretty cluster to the straight run in, where the Grey Chicken, May Boy, and Poor Dick, compounded; and the Chanticleer produced came on with the running, supported by Forward and Banbury—Myrtle, Equinoxe (whom Mr. T. Parr purchased from Mr. Morris), and the Motley filly, being well up to the distance, where the two latter were also beaten. Banbury (called so, owing to his having been bred by Mr. Barnes Austins, of that celebrated town of cakes, they challenged, quitted Forward and Myrtle, and, after a splendid race home with the favourite, won by half a length. Forward ran in third, nearly a brace of lengths from the Ino colt, and Myrtle was fourth. Equinoxe succeeded then, and was followed by the Motley filly. The winner, the last of The Hydra's stock, was bought in by Mr. Barber for 62 gs.

The Worcester Autumn Handicap, a sweepstakes of 10 sows each, 3 ft. and 3 only if declared, &c., with 100 added. Certain winners extra. Two miles. 37 subs, 12 of whom pay £3 each.

Mr. Fryer's Jack Leeming, 6 yrs, 8st 11lb Midgley 1
Mr. T. Chambers's Shakspeare, 3 yrs, 4st 11lb Fordham 2
Mr. T. Wood's Mortimer, 4 yrs, 7st 2lb Wells 3
Mr. T. Sterner's Sleeping Partner, 6 yrs, 6st 6lb Ashmole 4
Mr. T. Parr's Rataplan, 4 yrs, 9st 2lb, Flatman.
Mr. J. Osborne's Merry Bird, 6 yrs, 6st 8lb, Brazil.
Mr. Saxon's Cleveland, 5 yrs, 6st 4lb, Westley.
Mr. James's Magnet, 4 yrs, 5st 4lb, Oliver, jun.
Mr. Longmore's Ceres, 4 yrs, 5st 10lb, Bray.
Mr. I. Day's Waterfall, 6 yrs, 5st 10lb, Quinlan.

The betting was very limited, being confined to Rataplan, Jack Leeming, and Mortimer. The brother to Stockwell was supported at as little as 5 to 4, and in some quarters at even, but 5 to 4 was his fair price; 5 to 1 was taken about the Hsley horse, and 7 to 1 about Mortimer. The start was by no means satisfactory one, Cleveland getting off upon anything but equitable terms. Waterfall and Shakspeare were the first in motion, but when the lot were fairly settled down to their work, Jack Leeming, Sleeping Partner, and Mortimer joined them; Rataplan and Magnet preceding Merry Bird and Ceres, some lengths astern of whom came the laggy Cleveland. At the upper turn Magnet bolted, extinguishing all hopes of the Prestbury star being in the ascendency. No change of order in the front rank transpired until they neared the half mile post, where Waterfall and Sleeping Partner were beaten, and Jack Leeming came to the fore, with Shakspeare and Mortimer in his immediate wake, nothing being nearer than the half distance, and won in a canter by half-a-dozen lengths, Mortimer suffering Shakspeare to precede him at the finish, and the twin being a brace of lengths in advance of Sleeping Partner, immediately behind whom came Waterfall, the favourite heading the straggling lot more rearward. Clear value of the stakes, £286.

A Sweepstakes of 5 sows each, with 25 added. For horses not thoroughbred. Three-yr-olds and upwards. Certain allowances and penalties. One mile and a quarter. 7 subs.

Mr. White's Le Juff, 6 yrs, 10st 9lb J. Prince 1
Mr. T. Chambers's Shakspeare, 3 yrs, 4st 11lb Inno 2
Mr. Oliver's Nonsuch, 5 yrs, 10st 8lb Yates 3
Mr. Gibbs's Thirkley, 6 yrs, 10st 7lb Tasker 4
Mr. H. Johnson's The Despatch, 6 yrs, 10st 7lb, Cassidy.
Mr. Ansley's Marlborough Duck, 6 yrs, 10st 7lb, W. Archer.
Mr. Kelly's Hope, 4 yrs, 9st 12lb, Cable.

5 to 4 on Le Juff. Hope and Nonsuch showed in front for the first quarter of a mile, when the favourite came ahead, and ultimately won easily by three or four lengths. Shakspeare again ran second, beating Nonsuch by a length, a similar distance separating Thirkley from the latter.

The Autumn Flying Stakes, a Handicap of 5 sows each, with 40 added. For all ages. The second to save his stake. Rather more than half a mile. 29 subs.

Mr. Wood's Falcon, 3 yrs, 6st 11lb Snowden 1

Mr. Wilkins's Dear Me, 4 yrs, 7st, Charlton.
Mr. Doughty's Blossom, 3 yrs, 6st 10lb, Fordham.
Mr. J. Rose's Kalluka, 3 yrs, 6st 6lb, Carroll.
Mr. A. Phillips's Vivid, 3 yrs, 6st 6lb, Thorpe.
Mr. W. H. Scott's The Cripple, 3 yrs, 6st 4lb, D. Hughes.
Lord Warwick's Gossip, 2 yrs, 6st 3lb, T. Cliffe.
Mr. Powell's Dartmouth, 2 yrs, 6st 10lb, Prior.
Mr. Penn's Forrard, 2 yrs, 6st 7lb, Cresswell.

Even and 6 to 4 on Falcon, and 5 to 1 agst Lady Tatton. The latter and Dartmouth carried 5lb extra each, Gossip 3lb over, and Forrard 7lb over. Octavia, Kenyside Hero, and Dear Me, were the first on their legs, but Falcon soon shot to the helm, was never afterwards overhauled, or even reached, and won easily by four or five lengths, Octavia beating Lady Tatton three parts of a length more, with Kenyside Hero well up with them, Dear Me and Vivid heading the next lot.

WEDNESDAY.

The Hurdle-Race Handicap of 6 sows each, with 50 added. Two miles, over six flights of hurdles. 13 subs.

Mr. Capel's Black Bess, by Rataclier, 5 yrs, 9st 4lb, H. Archer 1
Mr. Gibbs's Jenny the Black Plate The Surveyor, 6 yrs, 10st 2lb R. Sly 2
Mr. Boyle's The Alp, aged, 10st 7lb C. Bayes 3
Mr. Evans's Teddesley, 5 yrs, 10st 10lb Holman, jun. 4
Mr. Bayner's Bullfinch, aged, 10st 2lb W. Archer 5
Mr. Roswell's Freedom, 5 yrs, 10st 10lb, Tasker.
Mr. Barling's Old Misery, aged, 9st 10lb, G. Eastwell.
Mr. Herbert's filly by Safeguard, out of Sarah Rybeene, 3 yrs, 8st 7lb, Oliver, jun.

Betting—5 to 1 agst Jenny the Black (late Surveyor), 5 to 2 agst Freedom, and 4 to 1 agst any other. Black Bess out on the work, supported by Old Misery (late Belmont), Teddesley, and Bullfinch, Jenny the Black and The Alp heading the next division. In this order they proceeded for about a mile and a quarter, when Old Misery, Bullfinch, Freedom, and the Safeguard filly were beaten, and Teddesley, Jenny, and The Alp laid to dispute the honours and benefit of victory. Teddesley, however, gave way before coming into the long length; and the favourite made his effort after landing over the last hurdles, closely followed by The Alp. They could not, however, "overhaul" Black Bess, who won easily by two lengths, despite a break-down at the last hurdles. The winner is by Rataclier, and this was her first race over hurdles.

The Worcestershire Grand Annual Steeplechase Handicap of 20 sows each, 1 ft. and 5 only if declared, &c., with 100 added. The second to receive back his stake. About four miles. 19 subs, 10 of whom paid £2 each.

Mr. B. Lane's Needwood, by The Beau, aged, 10st 10lb, Green 1
Mr. Barber's Spring, 6 yrs, 10st 2lb W. Archer 2
Mr. Barnard's Diana, aged, 10st 2lb, Tasker.
Mr. W. S. Cartwright's Maurice Daley, aged, 9st 10lb, R. James.

Mr. Gibbs's Thirkley, 6 yrs, 9st 7lb, R. Sly.
Mr. Barling's Old Misery, aged, 9st 4lb, G. Ratwell.
Mr. Boyle's Ceres, aged, 9st 4lb (carried 9st 10lb), C. Boyce.
Mr. Franklin's Frank, aged, 9st (carried 9st 3lb), Butler.

There was not much speculation about the issue of this event; the public seem now to fight very shy, after the palpable robberies of the last few seasons. 5 to 4 and even were laid agst Needwood, 2½ and 3 to 1 agst Spring, and 6 to 1 agst Maurice Daley, but to very small sums. Ceres, too, was also backed at the latter price, being the general favourite among the local men. The course was exactly the same as on former occasions, the start being effected from the Infirmary Turn. They came down to the stand-hurdles on pretty good terms, Ceres and Needwood being at the helm, and Old Misery at their heels, slightly in advance of the Cheltenham horses, Maurice Daley and Diana, Spring bringing up the rear. This order was preserved over the distance-hurdles, and to the Severn side, where Frank drew from the rear, and placed himself alongside Needwood, Ceres giving way at the bottom of the course. Facing towards home again, Thirkley also improved his position, joining Needwood and Frank, the latter being indulged with an occasional lead, and Green taking a pull at Needwood, until making the upper turn for the brook leading out of the race-course into the Moors. The favourite there shot to the fore, followed closely by Frank, Thirkley, Old Misery, and Diana—Maurice Daley, Ceres, and Spring being in the wake of the latter-mentioned quartette. In the meadows Frank and Old Misery declined a laid-fence and deep ditch (the same, we believe, where Proceed stopped), and lost some time that they were pulled up. Diana then went on with the running, having Needwood and Thirkley handy, and the trio landed some lengths on to the bottom of the course in advance of Spring, Maurice Daley, and Ceres. On re-entering the Moors, the two latter beat a further retreat; and at the horse-fence the field was still more reduced by Thirkley dislocating his shoulder. When within a mile of home, Spring crept gradually up to Needwood, was alongside him at the far meadows, and the two waited upon Diana until they had gained the race-course the last time. They then challenged the mare, who gave instantly into their hands; and in the final struggle home Needwood achieved a very clever victory over Spring by a couple of lengths. It is rather singular that Worcester should be fraught with serious accidents; it was in this race Anonymous, Quartermaster, Souvenir, and Chiffon, were killed.

The Hunt Steeplechase, a Sweepstakes of 5 sows each, with 50 added. Three miles. 4 subs.

Mr. Smith's Bastion, 6 yrs Oliver 1
Mr. Walker's The Captain, 6 yrs, 12 st 11lb Ormer 2
Mr. Holman's Dr. Thurst, 4 yrs, 11st 6lb G. Stevens 3
Mr. From's Harry, aged, 12st 11lb (carried 12st 8lb), Ormer.

Betting—5 and 6 to 4 on Harry, 6 and 7 to 4 agst Bastion. The latter made nearly all the running, and won by a length, the favourite refusing in the first mile and a half, and being stopped. Dr. Thurst also refused.

TURFIANA.

A MATCH, the fame of which will equal, if not eclipse, that of Mrs. Thornton at York, was made last week at the Limerick Races, between the Knight of Glyn and Mrs. Allan M'Donogh. Mrs. M'Donogh is matched to ride Seaman, the winner of the Grand National (Munster) Steeplechase, against the Knight of Glyn, who is to ride Victory, for £100 a-side, over the Conny Castle Steeplechase course, on the first Monday in December. Already several bets have been made, Mrs. M'Donogh, who is a famous horsewoman, being the favourite.

A SWEETSTAKES of 3 sovs each, h ft, with 25 added. Weight for age. Three miles. Steeplechase course. Was run off on Saturday last (this day week) over the Newcastle Course, Limerick, between Mr. Burke's Highland Mary, 10st 7lb; the Knight of Glyn's Victory, 10st 7lb; and Mr. Callaghan's Master Robert, 10st 10lb. Highland Mary, ridden by Driscoll, won easily by four lengths; Master Robert beaten off a long way.

LORD WATERFORD purchased Mr. Mahon's gr g Varnish, hy Polish, at the Cashel Steeplechases, on Tuesday last, for £160.

THE MATCH made at Limerick last week between Mr. Allan M'Donogh's Seaman and Mr. Burke's Waterford Tom resulted in the former walking over. It is, however, in dispute, and is likely to be referred to the stewards of the Turf Club, the Limerick stewards having refused to take cognizance of it, being a private affair.

MR. BRANSHAW'S PADDY CAREY, by Burgundy, out of Circe, a winner three times at the Maze October Meeting last week, was covering in the early part of the past season.

SALE OF IRISH RACE HORSES.—Mr. Courtenay sold Surprio colt, by Burgundy, after the race at Limerick on Wednesday, in which he ran a dead heat with Rosalba, to Lord Howth, for £150. His lordship next morning re-sold him to an English dealer for "foreign service" as a sire. Rosalba, filly, by Colwick, was also sold by Mr. Osborne to a Scotch gentleman, for £75. Little Martin, colt, by Maggie, winner of the Handicap Stakes at Limerick, on Thursday last, was sold by Mr. A. M'Donogh to Mr. T. Harrison, previous to the race, for £50. After winning the Corinthian Stakes at Limerick on Tuesday, the colt Borgia, the property of Lord Howth, was sold to the Knight of Glyn, for £45, fifteen of which went to the race fund. Next day Borgia won a Handicap Stake of 3 sovs each, 25 sovs added, beating Rosalba, Surprio, and Morgan Rattler, Gayland and Idle Girl paying forfeit. Mr. Thomas O'Reilly has sold Master Tom to Mr. George Bryan, of Jenkinsonstown, for £200. He won six Queen's Plates this year.

THE WARD UNION STAG-HOUNDS.

Then, again, with a few of the right sort, I know,
When many a good one, half-beaten, is shaking,
Over hedge, ditch, and river, triumpantly go,
And, in spite of mischances, be up at the taking.

The above celebrated pack met for the first time this season at the Hill of the Ward, where some sixty sportsmen assembled, and a truly gallant sight did they present to the spectator, mounted, as nearly they all were, upon steeds of surpassing strength, condition, and beauty.

There was but a slight sprinkling of the military out, as a good number of officers are away upon leave from their respective regiments; but this was amply atoned for by the presence of not a few of the most beautiful of the daughters of Eve, the glances from whose bright eyes encouraged many a red-coated Nimrod to risk his precious neck over some rather ticklish-looking crans, which he should otherwise have asked himself some questions before going at.

The deer was let off at half-past one at Mapotstown, and, after describing a small circle, put her head straight for Mr. Mathews's, of Balfestown, making across the southern part of Mr. Urell's land at Ballymacarney out into a sort of half-lane, half-road, and up to Kilbride. Here there was a check of eight or nine minutes, when the hounds again lit upon the scent, and went away at a dashing burst through Eaytown, crossing the river of the Dew, skirting Kennedy's, of Pleanstown, out upon the Asbourne-road, opposite to Mr. John Tew Armstrong's farm, which, however, she did not enter.

After this the hunt continued up to the rear of Mr. John Seagrave's, at Danuickey, and on to within a short distance of the old church of Kilsallaghan, where the hounds ran into her in view after as sharp a twelve minutes' piece of business (from the check) as ever was witnessed.

THE OPENING DAY OF THE OLD BERKSHIRE HOUNDS.

The first Wednesday in November, as usual, was the first day of the public hunting with the "old Berkshire hounds," when Tubney Lodge, the hunting-box of the worthy master, James Morrell, Esq., jun., was again the scene of "old English hospitality." A public breakfast was given in the large room of the lodge to the members of the hunt and their friends, of which a very large party partook. The tables were most profusely spread with a selection of viands, which even the greatest epicure might have been satisfied with. They included roast and boiled beef, 4 turkeys, 24 fowls, 3 Yorkshire hams, 7 tongues, 12 pigeon-pies, 12 brace of pheasants, 12 brace of partridges, &c. &c. The necessary accompaniments, including good old English ale, port, sherry, and cherry-brandy, were also most liberally handed round. The field was unusually large, with a good sprinkling of scarlet coats. Amongst the company we observed the respected master of the hunt, Messrs. H. Elwes, Montague, Colonel Phillips, F. Bowles, Phillips (master of the South Oxfordshire hounds), Dnfield, Jenkins, Neate, Everett, Cooke, Dr. Somerset, Cuffin, Burgess, Hon. E. B. Portman, J. Aldworth, Captain Dewar, Oliver, Thompson, Dalzell, Spencer, Parr, Price, W. Graham, Peel, Parkinson, Finch, Lampitt, Serjison, Bridges, Fitzgerald, Atkins, V. Cherwell, J. Cooke, Bartley, Barrett, Fardell, Pigott, Hamber, Scott, Severne, Suttie, Lucy, Wigby, Radcliffe, Shipton, &c. &c.

After the gentry had done honour to the good things placed before them, the yeomanry and tradesmen of the neighbourhood including a large number of the latter from Oxford, were kindly invited to the breakfast room, where their keen appetites were soon appeased. The toddlers, as usual, were not forgotten, a liberal allowance of bread and cheese and strong ale was distributed to upwards of 300. During the repast, the hounds were released from the kennels and marshalled by the huntsmen and whippers-in, to the lawn in front of the breakfast room; they were in first rate condition, their appearance as well as everything connected with the "Old Berkshire Hunt," reflecting the highest credit on all connected with that establishment. Shortly before twelve o'clock the hounds trotted off (and never do we on any similar occasion remember seeing so large a field of sportsmen), to Wick Scrubbs, which proved blank. Barnstaple Covers, Lyford Copces, and Scatterash were also blanks. At the New House Gorse a fine fox broke cover, which after a good two mile run went to earth in Longworth Lodge Gorse. The hounds were led on to Arrowdown Hill, when a brace were soon started, one of which ran through Kingston Brock, then to Appleton Common, and back to Kingston, where the hounds gallantly ran in to him, after a good run of an hour and half.

MR. ASSHETON SMITH'S HOUNDS—THE GRAND OPENING DAY.

The first "open day" of the present season took place on the 26th ult., when a goodly number of the true lovers of the chase assembled to do honour to the gallant 'Squire, who, although in the seventy-ninth year of his age, evinces such an unceasing desire to provide them with an abundance of sport. Foremost amongst the company present we observed the Hon. Mr. and Mrs. Pierrepont, Sir Charles, Lady, and Miss Morgan, Mr. and Mrs. Henage, Mr. and Mrs. Drummond, Mr. and Mrs. Langham, and Mr. Clarke, all of whom had, for a short time, been enjoying the hospitality of Mr. Smith and his estimable lady. The general company included the Marchioness of Ailesbury, Earl Bruce, Mr. E. Antrobus (Amesbury) and Lady Antrobus, Baron Langham, (Attache to the Prussian Embassy), Lord Portsmouth, Col. Lascelles, General Shrubrick, Col. Russell, Sir John and Lady Pollen, Mr. Pearce (Master of the "H. H."), Mr. Geo. Wall (Master of the Hambledon Hounds), Mr. Lowe (Master of the Hursley Hounds), Mr. T. E. Fowley (Durrington), Rev. P. Best and party (Red Rice), Mr. Everett (Enfield, Middlesex), Mr. and Mrs. Turner, Mr. Dyke Poore, Mr. and Mrs. Campbell

The meeting on the first day was at Bygrave House, and the well-known J. Smith, Esq., showed the lovers of the leash such hares as are not always to be found, and such as would test the speed and stamina of the greyhounds, and satisfy the most fastidious of a long run. The second day was over the Mallington Fields; and here, as usual, were plenty of hares. Each course was compared to a regular fox hunt, leading the hounds some miles to cover, and giving them bellows to mend.

BEDDINGHAM.—VISIT OF THE RUSSIAN OFFICERS.—On Monday last a party of the officers on parole accepted the invitation of Mr. Thomas Ellman, of Beddingham, to participate in the pleasures of coursing. The day proved fine, and the company had good sport, after which they partook of an elegant cold collation at Mr. Ellman's residence, where, apparently, they greatly enjoyed the true English hospitality that was offered them. Upon leaving, they expressed the gratification they experienced from the kindness of Mr. and Mrs. Ellman, which they should ever regard, even when they returned to their fatherland, which they hoped to do next year. Although as yet they have not had great opportunities of acquiring our language, still they have made sufficient progress to be intelligible upon ordinary subjects. Their pronunciation is generally superior to that of the French, which is, doubtless, attributable to the fact that very many of our own words, of Saxon origin, assimilate very closely to their own. They appear to have sufficient philosophy to regard their residence here more as one of pleasure than of restriction, and to enjoy all the opportunities of recreation that are presented to them. They are very moderate in their habits, and well-conducted, and will, therefore, secure the respect of the inhabitants of the town and neighbourhood.—Sussex Express.

DEER-STALKING.—Almost all the deer forests are now deserted by sportsmen for the season, and, with the exception of a shot here and there to secure a large head, the glens and coverts are left in quiet possession of their antlered tenants. In respect to the number of large heads and the fine quality of the venison, the sport of 1854 has been most satisfactory. The following returns have been received from some forests:—At Lochaleish, Sir Arthur Chichester shot thirty-seven red-deer (the first season of a new forest). The Duke of Leeds finished his season at Inverchie on the 18th, having shot seventy-five stags and one hind—a great many very fine stags amongst them. In the forest of Glenstrathfarrar, seventy-five stags and thirty hinds were shot; of that number twenty-five stags fell to Lord Lovat's rifle, and forty to that of the Master of Lovat. Thirty-three stags averaged 16 stone, and with antlers of ten times each. The two last shots of the season, by the Master of Lovat, had both royal heads. One head of antlers was 33 inches wide inside the bow, and 33 inches long; the other antlers 25 inches in length and 30 inches wide. In the forests of Glenmariston, Sir Henry Menz and friends have had excellent sport; upwards of thirty stags have been shot, Sir Henry having shot twenty-six of them and at one stalking four good stags. Several fine heads from this forest have antlers of a peculiar form, the figure or outline of each antler, in profile and front, being like the letter S. At Struy, A. C. Barclay, Esq., and friends, shot fourteen stags, besides 750 brace of game. At Guisachan Sir Thomas Munro and Captain Tomline bagged twelve stags and thirty-three milder. In Strathconan Forest the Marquis of Bath shot twenty-three stags and about 1,500 brace of game. Captain Baring shot nine stags; Mr. Digby and friends fifteen at Kinlochewe; Mr. La Touche eleven to his own gun at Dunbeath; Mr. Pryor had twelve stags at Strathvaich, and the party at Fannich, ten.

SPLENDID SPORT.—During last week, J. A. Stuart Nicholson, Esq., Carnock, has been entertaining a shooting party of the neighbouring county gentlemen at his hospitable mansion, consisting of William Forbes, Esq., yr., of Callendar; Major Chalmer, of Larbert House; David Stenart, Esq., of Steuarthall; Graham Moir, Esq., of Leekie, &c. &c. The sport enjoyed over the lands of Carnock was capital—upwards of 500 hares, besides other game, having been bagged by the party.

SPORTING MISCELLANEOUS.

BIRDS OF A FEATHER FLOCK TOGETHER.—The only point upon which Lord Macdonald seems to be unusually strict with his tenants is the preservation of game. The birch woods and moors of Sleat are consequently stocked with innumerable flocks of blackcock and grouse, which commit considerable depredations on the corn-fields of the tenants, and prove an almost irresistible temptation to every one possessed of a gun. Notwithstanding his lordship's strictness, poachers do occasionally take a shot at a bird, and an incident came to light the other day which shows that there are more ways than one of poaching. A "decent body," who has a croft on the Armadale property, was looking disconsolately at his soaked "stookies" of corn, and wondering whether the rain would ever let him carry them home, when a large covey of blackcocks flew right into the field before his face, perched themselves upon his corn, and commenced to make a hearty meal in broad daylight. The gamekeeper was not far off, so Rory put his hands in his pockets and went home; but, when night drew near, he slunk out to the field, bent on securing some of the blackcock by way of compensation. He got into one of the "stookies," heaped the sheaves well about him, and waited till the next covey should approach within reach. He had not waited long, when, with a wild whirr, a whole dozen of birds came sweeping round the hill, and settled on the very stook in which Rory was concealed, cackling loudly, and tearing away at the corn-sheaves right above his head. Rory slowly stretched forth his hands towards two splendid plump birds, and was in the act of seizing their black legs, when—horrible to relate!—through an opening between the sheaves he saw a man just about to fire a gun at the very birds he was seizing. There he stood, within twenty yards, the gun cocked and presented, and the man's hand upon the trigger! In a paroxysm of fear, Rory fell back, shrieking murder and death; the sheaves fell down about him, the birds flew off with awful noise, the gun was fired, and Rory believed himself as dead as a door-post, when a plump blackcock fell like a bag of lead upon his face, and covered him with blood. Fortunately nothing was killed but the bird and Rory's poaching predilections. As for the poacher, he threw down his gun and fled in great alarm, and has not since been heard of; and the bird was silently committed to the depths of a neighbouring loch, with the gun tied to its heels.—Inverness Courier.

A CONSCIENTIOUS POACHER.—The following advertisement appears in the Wolverhampton Chronicle of Wednesday:—"Lord Dartmouth begs to express his acknowledgments of the courteousness of fair play exhibited by the writer of the enclosed—a hare having been unwittingly killed in Patchull-park, and afterwards carried away, half a sovereign is enclosed herein for the Earl of Dartmouth to dispose of as he thinks fit—and to give his assurance that the half-sovereign shall be properly applied."

PRICE OF HORSES.—At the Limerick great fair the horse-fair was not as good as might have been expected. The show was said, by those who came a distance to purchase, to be indifferent, and the quality to be such as not to afford encouragement to buyers. There were no English buyers whatever. Alderman E. Reynolds, of Dublin, attended to purchase high-priced horses; he obtained but three, for one of which he gave £50. Mr. Henry Reynolds, of Dublin, attended to purchase for the 5th Dragoon Guards, and succeeded in obtaining a lot of eight which were considered good. Mr. Bohey, of Stephen's-green, Dublin attended for the Scots Greys and Royal Artillery; he made a few purchases, some at high prices, from £20 to £30. Mr. Kenyes, of Hospital, attended for the 8th Hussars and the 7th Dragoon Guards, and got a few. Colonel Gibson, of the cavalry depot, Newbridge, attended to purchase for the depot, with Veterinary Surgeon Reynolds, of the Newbridge depot also, under whose inspection all the cavalry horses were passed. Colonel Smith, of the 16th Lancers, and Veterinary Surgeon Collins, of the same regiment, attended with Mr. Hartigan, of the repository, to purchase for the 16th; but they did not succeed in obtaining a horse. Captain Reilly, 8th Hussars, Captain Harley, 5th Dragoon Guards, and Lieutenant Clarke, of the 4th Dragoon Guards (Royal Irish), were present to purchase for their respective regiments, but they did not succeed.

ROYAL THAMES YACHT CLUB.

The monthly meeting of this club was held on Wednesday evening last, at the Bedford Hotel, Covent-garden, Commodore Lord Alfred Paget, M.P., in the chair. About forty members attended the house dinner. At the subsequent muster for the transaction of business, the minutes of the previous meeting having been read by the Secretary, were confirmed. After which a ballot was taken, and the sixteen candidates, whose names have already appeared in THE FIELD, were elected. Several other names were immediately set down for the December ballot. Mr. Harrison Chilton's motion was, after a very able and interesting discussion, referred to the Sailing Committee, whose report will be read to the general meeting on the 6th of December next. It was afterwards proposed by Mr. Wilkinson, and seconded by Mr. Hutchins, and carried unanimously,—"That the posting of the names of members indebted to the club for subscriptions or other sums, which by resolution of the club on the 5th July last was to be carried into effect immediately after this meeting, be postponed until after the December meeting."

Several new yachts have entered the club of late. We understand that the gallant Commodore is building a new craft of 66 tons, to be called the "Alma."

LONDON MODEL YACHT CLUB.—The next general monthly meeting will be held on Tuesday, November 7th, at Anderton's Hotel, 164, Fleet-street, at eight o'clock precisely, when several gentlemen will be balloted for. [The names have already appeared in THE FIELD.] The nomination of officers for the ensuing year will also take place, the election to follow at the December meeting. The present officers are eligible for re-election.

YANKEE YACHTING.

HARLEM REGATTA.

The race of yachts of 28 feet and under, came off on Thursday, the 14th of September. The morning was beautiful, and to make it more so, a strong north-east wind was blowing. About two o'clock, p.m., the boats were ordered up to their places by the judges, Messrs. Boyce and Heddling. The course of the race was from the stake-boat anchored off Harlem Bridge, through the hills and up to the East river to Throggs Point and back, making the distance about twenty miles. The prize was $50. The following yachts were entered by their respective owners:—

	ft. in.	ft. in.
Louisa Jane	21 6	Challenge
Quaker	21 6	Telegraph
Olivia	26 3	Clickener
C. Pool	27 10 1/2	J. S. Austin

Two minutes were allowed to the boats for difference of length. Very soon after the start it was pretty evident that the contest was between the Telegraph, Quaker, Clickener, and Challenge. As soon as the boats turned towards the buoy, after passing through the hills, a distance of about eight miles lay before them, a dead beat to windward, and after passing Riker's Island, the Telegraph began to have it all her own way, and turned the buoy ahead of all her competitors. She was handled by Mr. Henry Taylor, who did her justice. After turning the buoy, they started for home, and never was a more beautiful run seen. About two hours after they started, it began to rain lively, but everything went off satisfactorily to those engaged in the race, and also to the spectators, and the judges' decision was received with no grumbling. Below is the time the yachts turned the stake-boat, as placed by the judges' decision:—

	ft. in.	ft. in.
Telegraph	3 1 00	Olivia
Clickener	3 4 04	C. Pool
Quaker	3 4 25	J. S. Austin
Challenge	3 6 65	Louisa Jane

THE REGATTA AT HOBOKEN, NEW YORK.

Hoboken, N.J., Oct. 2, 1854.

The great boat-race of the season came off here last Friday. The prizes were offered by Capt. A. Barker, mine host of the Atlantic, amounting to the very handsome sum of $140, in three prizes, of $75, $40, and $25. The race was open to all sail-boats of 28 feet and under; to sail from Hoboken, around stake-boat in Butternut Channel, back to Hoboken, and repeat, making twenty miles; small boats to have the start of two minutes per foot. The race was to come off the week before last, but there being scarcely any wind on the day appointed, it was postponed to Thursday, September 18. Although on the first day there was no wind, still the "boys" wanted to have a race, so Captain Barker offered a purse of $25, just to keep them quiet till the great race came off. This purse was won by himself in the Gipsy, with ease, though this was only a drifting match. Last Thursday they started, according to notice, twelve boats in all, no wind and strong tide. This was apparently the most closely contested race on record, for after going once over the course, the whole twelve boats came in so close together, that you could have stepped through the fleet, from one to the other, and no judges could have told which was ahead. This will be understood better when we state that the boats were all picked up drifting around the bay, and towed to Hoboken by a steamboat kindly chartered by Captain Barker. So the race was postponed till the next day, Friday, September 29.

This day they had wind enough, it blowing half a gale from the north, with a flood tide. It was concluded to start all the boats together, and make the allowance for length on coming in. The following boats were entered:—

	ft. in.	ft. in.
Charlie Pool	28 2	Celeste
John S. Austin	28 0	Louisa Jane
C. V. Clickener	27 1	Helle of Greenpoint
Olivia	26 7	Flirt
Eliza	25 7	Mystery
Gipsy	23 7	Greenian

All started, except the Flirt and Grecian, they deeming it much more prudent to remain where they were, it being rather rough for small craft. At 1.20 p.m., the word was given to go, and off they went all in a heap. The Olivia, in getting off, got entangled with the Eliza, and the Mystery the next moment got entangled with both, and all three drifted foul of the Maria; and by the time they got clear and in order again, the other boats were off Jersey City; so they returned home again. They had a fine time of it, going down before the wind, but on rounding the stake-boat, and coming close-hauled, they told a different tale. The Celeste could not carry at all, and had to settle away to bale out, and came home under balance-reef. The Louisa Jane "up stick" and ran away from it. The Belle of Greenpoint got foul of another boat off Pier No. 1 N. R., and capsized. The other boats carried through, and rounded the stake-boat at Hoboken the first time as follows:—

	ft. in.	ft. in.
Gipsy	2 31 16	Charlie Pool
J. S. Austin	2 33 00	Eliza
C. V. Clickener	2 34 27

The original ten were now reduced to five, and they went down again before the wind, seeming almost to fly over the water. On this round the Eliza carried away her jib-boom and withdrew, leaving the other four to fight it out. They all got safely home, though the Pool once ran under, and they had to shake her up to bale out, rounding the stake-boat as follows:—

	ft. in.	ft. in.
Gipsy	3 44 12	C. V. Clickener
J. S. Austin	3 45 15	Charlie Pool

The Gipsy taking the first prize, $75; Clickener the second, $40; and the Austin the third, $25.

Thus ended one of the finest races we have ever witnessed. There was no chance to take advantage of eddies, catpaws, sculling, pulling, &c., but it was fair and square sailing; the boats did the business, and not those who sailed them. The result of the race greatly astonished the knowing ones, who all supposed that the Gipsy, being so flat and light, would stand no chance at all in a sea, especially against the famous John S. Austin (formerly the George Clark); and when the result was announced that the Gipsy beat her ten minutes (allowing time for size), they could scarce believe it. After the race, there was some talk about a match between the Eliza and the Gipsy, but the former afterwards declined it. I hear that the Gipsy is now open for a match, with anything afloat, for pretty much any amount. While this remains so, I think we may claim for Hoboken the credit of having the smartest little boat around New York; if it nint so, let them bring along their boats, for the Gipsy (or, at any rate, their pockets), are open to conviction.

ROWING.

CRICKET AT IFFLEY.

The closing match of the season of this club was played at Iffley; the first eleven playing twenty-four. On the side of the eleven, the batting of Messrs. H. Blay, J. Danbe, Rev. Dr. Warburton, and R. Bly. The former scoring 47 and 37—was excellent. The victory of the eleven may be mainly attributed to the excellent bowling of Messrs. R. and H. Blay, which was much admired by upwards of seventy members of this prosperous club. A handsome dinner was served on the ground. The chair was taken by the Rev. Dr. Warburton, vicar of Iffley (a staunch supporter of cricket), surrounded by a host of the gentry of the village.

WHY is a person asking questions the strangest of individuals?—Because he's the querist.

A COUNTING-GENTLEMAN.—A tradesman, living in the Rue St. Honoré, possesses a young and pretty wife, who is passionately fond of the theatre, but being continually occupied in business, he is rarely able to indulge her. A few days ago she got a ticket for the Porte St. Martin, and telling him that it had been given to her, asked him to accompany her. He promised, but when evening came was unable to go. The wife, who was en grande toilette, was furious at her disappointment, but determined not to be banished, she made her servant accompany her. On leaving the theatre she was followed by two young men, who were very insolent. To escape them she called a cab that was passing; but the coachman made a sign that he had some one in the vehicle. She was turning away, when the cab stopped, and an elegantly dressed young man jumped from it. "I see, ladies," he said, with a low bow, "that you are annoyed by two insolent fellows. Deign to accept this cab—I will seek for another." The tradeswoman accepted with thanks, and the gentleman handed her and her servant in with the greatest politeness. She gave her address to the cabman, and the vehicle drove off. Arrived near her own residence she stopped, and asked what there was to pay. "21f. 75c," said the cabman. "What, 21f.?" cried the tradeswoman in astonishment. "Why, you have only come from the Porte St. Denis, and have not been half an hour on the way." "Do not talk nonsense," said the cabman, rudely. "I have been driving the gentleman about since morning. But where is he? Disappeared!" On discovering that his fare really had disappeared the man thought the women were in connivance with him to cheat him, and he became very insolent. The tradeswoman had not money enough to satisfy his demand, and he gave her and her companion into custody. They had to pass the whole night in the guard-house de la Lingerie, and were not released until the next morning, when the tradesman claimed them, and indemnified the coachman. The tradeswoman vows that she will never go to the play again without her husband.

ANSWERS TO INQUIRIES.

Gun-room and Ward-room—Sir,—I would have answered thy query in your No. 04, about the difference between "gun-room" and "ward-room," but thought there would have been plenty of naval men among your readers to do so. Instead of the nonsense you have had sent by "W. A. S." and "Nauticus," The Gun has nothing whatever to do with the gun-room, or main-deck-war; but I will tell you, in a few words, the difference between gun-room and ward-room. In a line of battle ship the ward-room is the part of the main, or middle deck (accordingly as she is a two- or three-decker) next the stern, which is partitioned off to form the mess-room and cabins of the commander, lieutenants, and their brother officers, while the subordinate officers (mates, midshipmen, &c.) occupy the gun-room as a mess-room on the after part of the lower deck. In all other classes of 11 M's vessels the gun-room contains the mess-place and cabins of the lieutenants, &c., on the lower deck, and there is no ward-room; the mid occupies their "birth" (the Commander if N.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1854.
NEWS OF THE WEEK.

GOVERNMENT may have hereafter to explain how it happens that on the 3rd of November no official information had been received, or, at all events, published, of the commencement of the bombardment of Sebastopol, which began upon the 17th of October. In the absence of official information, which we must, despite reports to the contrary conclude has not arrived (the promise of the Duke of Newcastle having been given that no time should be lost in promulgating any news the Ministry might receive), we can only recur to the details furnished by private enterprise, and to the manifestoes of the enemy. The bombardment began on the day above-mentioned, and casualties on both sides marked the commencement of the terrible work. Two powder magazines belonging to the French exploded, and a tremendous explosion took place in Sebastopol. The natural impression on the minds of English reporters is that great damage was done to the stronghold, and this is most probable; but the Russians, thus far, appear to have given, in vulgar phrase, "as good as they got." Two of our ships were set on fire, ninety-six of the men were killed, and, of course, a proportionate number wounded. On the other hand we are told that the slaughter in Sebastopol was so fearful that the very atmosphere was tainted; but this appalling statement is a good deal toned down when we refer to the electric text: "Numerous corpses infect the air." The Admiral Nachimoff, one of the two commanders most active in the Sinope massacre, is said to have been accorried, like his colleague, to the court of Nicholas Senior, moyennant the fragment of a shell. The Russian report that they made a sortie, and captured several guns, but we have the fact only from Prince Menschikoff, whose name is not precisely a synonyme with veracity. An allegation that the English cavalry had been cut up, and Lord Dunkellin, son of Lord Clanricarde, captured, is at present regarded as too Russian for probability. But, on the whole, it would be premature to say there was anything discouraging in the state of the siege, as far as we have any means of estimating the circumstances. Every one knew that the place was almost as strong as nature and art could render a fortress; and every one knew, also, that unless surprised and taken by a coup de main—the most improbable of events—a certain number of days' siege, and a large loss of life, must be the price at which Sebastopol was to be gained. The resistance of the Russians will, doubtless, have been of the most obstinate description, but we should be doing an injustice to the gallant and skilful leaders of the expedition, and to the gallantry of the allied armies, did we express a doubt of the final issue. England, however, has a right to complain that, during a struggle of such intense interest to her, both nationally and as regards her individual households, the means of procuring intelligence are so contemptibly scanty. A great improvement in this respect has been promised, but an organization which cannot require any large outlay of intellect or money has not yet been proved practicable. We can only hear what the Emperor of Russia and the editors of the daily papers think it right we should hear.

The expression "timid counsels" in the consolatory letter of the Emperor of the French to the widow of St. Arnaud has caused immense sensation. Who was timid? is the question in every one's mouth. The Tories say that the Emperor meant Lord Aberdeen. The Times says that his Majesty referred to his own advisers, but hints that if he had meant Admiral Dundas, he would not have been far wrong. And after much discussion in every English print, and the exchange of a great deal of insinuation and sarcasm, the Moniteur is instructed to say—and the public is instructed to believe—that the Emperor meant nobody in particular, and that the expression was rather intended to exalt the gallantry of the deceased Marshal than to diminish the credit of anybody else—a rather curious piece of explanation to be received with due gravity.

So, also, let us receive the apologies which are being put forth in order to make the return of the Baltic expedition less ridiculous in the eyes of the nation. The blockade has, we are told, been theoretically perfect, and if utterly useless, in regard to Russian commerce, it was not the fault of the admiral. Then Bomarsund was a great feat, but one not followed up. The reason of this, we are told, was, that the destruction of Bomarsund was an experiment. We only wanted to know whether we could destroy all the Baltic fortresses, whose construction had been so much vaunted. We found that we easily could; and we did not, of course. Let us hope that Sir Charles will be able to make a better story for himself; the Napiers have never been inefficient performers on their private trumpets.

Lord Palmerston has made a speech to some virtuous agriculturists, among whom he has had to distribute rewards. He enunciated a doctrine which may find sceptics both in the nursery and in the pulpit. He asserted that all children were born naturally good, and that it was bad education, or no education at all, that made them turn out evil. The Times' leader-writer, who reviews him, is evidently a married man, or, at least, the father of a family, and repudiates the doctrine, having probably suffered from causeless screaming, or had to deal with stubborn silks. Lord Palmerston duly cautioned his hearers against the Scylla and Charybdis of agricultural life, hewshops and smoking. At the same celebration he made a few eloquent observations in connection with the war, and said something at which the Aberdeen party have snapped with great eagerness, as shewing that Lord Palmerston concurred with Government in clucking to a hope of peace long after the country had determined that there could be no peace and should be none. The testimony does not come to much—not half so much as Lord Palmerston's actual presence in the ministry—but it has been caught at as if very valuable.

Archdeacon Wilberforce, as everybody expected, has left the Church of England, and joined that of Rome. The loss may be supposed to be almost balanced, by the recent transfer of some six-and-thirty Roman Catholics of Bernondsey to the Auglican faith. But Romanism has other troubles. Mr. Lucas, the great ultra-montau champion, has assaulted the Roman Catholic bishops in Ireland, for desiring a fire-brand priest to mind his flock, and leave politics alone, and the Pope is to be appealed to against the decision. The Church of England is exerting itself laudably to supply religious assistance to the army in Turkey—less laudably, in the case of some of its members, in seeking, at home, to be put on war footing, by the revival of Convocation-militant. A petition has been presented to the Bankruptcy Court for the purpose of making Mr. Hudson, the deposed railway king, a bankrupt, in respect to certain dealings, but this seems to be a mere demonstration. A case in which feminine scandal and the imputation of forgery are mixed up, and the London Missionary Society (the agent of dissent) has officials implicated, is interesting the so-called religious world. And the Patriotic Fund is being swollen by donations and subscriptions, to gather which enthusiastic meetings assemble in every part of the kingdom.

There has been little stirring at Windsor during the week. The Royal Family have availed themselves of the fine weather to take their customary exercise in the Home Park. On Monday and Tuesday his Royal Highness, accompanied by Prince Nicholas of Nassau, and the Right Honourable Sidney Herbert, and attended by Lord de Tabley, Major-General the Hon. Charles Grey, and Colonel F. H. Seymour, went out shooting.

METROPOLIS.

BALL AND CONCERT AT THE GUILDHALL IN AID OF THE PATRIOTIC FUND.—It will be remembered that at a Court of Common Council, held on Thursday week, on the motion of Sir J. Duke, seconded by Mr. Carr, it was unanimously resolved, "That the use of the Guildhall, after the banquet on Lord Mayor's Day, should be granted for the purpose of a ball and concert in aid of the Patriotic Fund." A committee was thereupon formed, with a view to carrying this benevolent object into effect, and they met yesterday for the first time to make their preliminary arrangements. Alderman Farcomb was unanimously called to the chair. It was decided that the price of a gentleman's ticket should be 15s.; that of a lady, 10s. 6d.; and for a double ticket a guinea. The day fixed for the ball is Wednesday, the 15th November. A sub-committee of seven was formed for the purpose of making the necessary arrangements, which, it is believed, will be executed on a scale of almost unexampled grandeur and magnificence. On Thursday a meeting of the citizens of London was held at the Mansion-house, in aid of the Royal Commission. The Lord Mayor presided; and there were also present:—The Lord Mayor Elect; Mr. T. Baring, M.P.; Mr. G. C. Glyn, M.P.; Mr. T. Hankey, M.P.; Mr. S. Gregson, M.P.; Mr. M. T. Smith, M.P.; Mr. J. G. Hubbard, Governor of the Bank of England; Mr. T. M. The total amount of the subscriptions already received was upwards of £16,000.

THE PUBLIC HEALTH.—DECREASE OF CHOLERA.—(From the Registrar-General's Report.)—From the present return it will be seen that the cholera epidemic in London is for this season quickly passing away, and that the total mortality has nearly resumed its former position. In the week that ended on Saturday the number of deaths registered from all causes was 1,228. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1844-53 the average number of deaths was 952, and with a correction for increase of population 1,047. The excess of last week is 181. The deaths from cholera, which were 163 in the preceding week, have fallen to 66. Those from diarrhoea are 46. In the western districts 10 deaths from cholera were registered last week; in the northern 3, in the central 11, in the eastern 12, and in the southern districts 30. The 66 deaths occurred in the various sub-districts as follows:—In Chelsea South, 2; in Chelsea North-east, 1; in Belgrave, 3; in St. Margaret, Westminster, 2; in Long-acre, 2; in St. Mary (Marylebone), 1; in Regent's Park, 1; in Kentish-town, 1; in St. Giles, South, 4; in City-road, 3; in St. Botolph, 1; in Cripplegate, 1; in West London North, 1; in City of London South, 1; in Holywell, 1; in Hackney-road, 2; in Bethnal-green, 2; in the Town of Bethnal-green, 1; in Artillery (Whitechapel), 1; in Mile-end New Town, 1; in Whitechapel Church, 1; in St. Mary (St. George-in-the-East), 1; in Poplar, 2; in St. Saviour (South-west), 6; in St. John Horselydown, 3; in St. Mary Magdalen (Bermondsey), 3; in Kent-road, 3; in Borough-road, 1; in Trinity (Newington), 1; in St. Peter (Walworth), 3; in Waterloo-road (first part), 1; in Lambeth Church (second part), 1; in Kennington (first part), 1, in Clapham, 1; in Camberwell, 2; in Greenwich West, 2; in Greenwich East, 1; and in Plumstead, 1. Last week the births of 733 boys and 714 girls, in all 1,447 children, were registered in London. In the nine corresponding weeks of the years 1845-53 the average number was 1,407.

BATTERSEA LITERARY AND SCIENTIFIC INSTITUTION.—On Tuesday last Commodore Chubb, of the Anglesey Yacht Club, delivered a very interesting lecture before the members on "The Advantages of Combination as instanced by Life Assurance, Building, Land, and other Provident Societies." The lecturer commenced by saying, "Combination signifies union, and it may exist for an unlawful as well as a lawful purpose; but it has rarely ever been known to maintain strength long when the union is an unlawful one, as, in the instance of strikes, riots, and the like. There is generally discord inherent in an unlawful union, which, sooner or later, takes root in its vitality, and, promoting dissension, breaks asunder its bonds. The most extraordinary combination of modern times for supporting right against might, and checking the advance of universal tyranny and oppression, and placing the peace and harmony of the world on a sure basis, is witnessed by the union of the hands and hearts of the two greatest nations of the world, at present joined to hurl back despotism on the haughty tyrant of the north. Would to God he were engaged in promoting the advancement of science and the raising the moral standard of his own subjects, by directing their attention to peaceful pursuits, instead of playing that disastrous part in the battle-fields, where the sad conditions are those which exact as the stake the prosperity of nations and the blood of men, whose the winner is he who best succeeds in destroying what he covets, without being able to foresee the extent of the sacrifices he must impose on himself to obtain it." The lecturer then proceeded to give the history of friendly societies, and traced their origin to the Saxons, illustrating his theory by reading some quaint rules, translated from the original Saxon, of societies held at Cambridge and Exeter, and traced their modern formation from the time the Legislature first gave attention to the subject in 1773 to the recent act of the 13 and 14 Vic. c. 115. He then described the origin and principles of the building and land societies, and completed his lecture by a very elaborate exposition of the history and principles of life assurance associations, with a statistical survey of the bills of mortality, and various tables which have, from time to time, formed the bases of calculation. The lecturer introduced some very extraordinary anecdotes illustrative of the advantages of adopting the principles, and also some remarkable trials arising out of speculations of the kind in a former era. He made several very vivid appeals to his audience, commendatory of the system, and alluded to the recent visitation of cholera in the following language:—"What numberless instances have lately occurred around us, where the strong, the healthy, the fathers of families, have been suddenly struck down by the invisible agency of that dire and awful pestilence which sends no herald to announce its approach—a few short hours and the prop of a house is gone, and those it supported enveloped in its ruin. There are some death-bed scenes where consolation and hope may, in some measure, alleviate the bitterness of separation, but, what must be the feelings of him, the agonising thoughts, of the forgetfulness to have made a provision for such a moment." The pains of illness may be alleviated by the sympathies of love, and the pillow of death smoothed down by the hand of affection, but what can relieve the torture of a mind racked with the consciousness of its own want of foresight and the criminal neglect of this great moral duty." The president of the society, the Rev. J. S. Jenkinson, vicar of Battersea, was in the chair, and a large assembly greeted the lecturer at his conclusion with considerable applause. A future lecture is announced by Dr. Bain, on "Respiration and the Necessity of Free Ventilation as a Sanitary Measure."

OUR OPERA-GLASS.

ADELPHI.—On Monday evening Morris Barnett's successful comedy, "The Serious Family," was presented as a first piece at this theatre. With one or two exceptions, the cast was the same as on its representation here some months back, the difference in the allotment of the characters being in those of Charles Torrens and Emma Torrens, respectively sustained by Mr. Selby and Miss Wyndham. The part of Charles Torrens was originally acted by Mr. Webster, and it must therefore be acknowledged that Mr. Selby had a difficult task accorded him. With the skill of a true tactician, the actor endeavoured, by a general care, to strengthen the comedy rather than to render the character too prominent. In this he was quite successful, and left little to be wished for. Miss Wyndham acquitted herself with much archness and naïveté, and evinced, by the perfectness of her study and an attention to detail, the love that she has of her profession at heart. Such being the case, she will speedily raise herself in the public estimation as an actress, and may look soon to reap further histrionic honours. Leigh Murray has so firmly established himself as the real and legitimate successor of Wallace in the gay and dashing Irish gentleman, Captain Murphy Maguire, that commendation of his performance on the occasion in question would be work of supererogation. Keeley as Amindab Shek, Mrs. Leigh Murray in Lady Sowerby O'Connell, Miss Woolgar as Mrs. Charles Torrens, and Mrs. Keeley as the vivacious widow, Mrs. O'Connell Delawine, were, as heretofore, most excellent. After the comedy, a new farcical sketch, by William Brough, Esq., entitled "Bonâ Fide Travellers," was presented for the first time, and met, as it deserved, a very hearty reception. The piece is an ad captandam sketch, intended as a bit at the new Bear Bill, and showing some of the difficulties arising from the impossibility to decide who are and who are not bonâ fide travellers. It is a circumstance worthy of remark how rapidly the subjects of the day are held hold of by the management of this theatre and presented in amusing dramatic form to the public. Scarcely has a matter become the general topic, than—dramatised by an author of known repute and capably enacted—it is served up as an entertaining dish to the guests at this little temple of the Muses; an occasional visit to the Adelphi, therefore, will serve to keep one au fait to the way the world is wagging. The scene of the novelty is laid in the bar-parlour of the Goat's Head public-house, the time being from three to five p.m., the hours prohibited for the sale of liquors. Butts (Mr. R. Romer), the landlord, and Joe (Mr. Keeley), the potboy, are solacing themselves with the reflection that the Beer Bill gives them at least a few hours rest from labour, of which the former avails himself to take a stroll in the rural shades of Battersea-fields, and the latter to enjoy his beer and pipe in peaceful ease. Having been strictly enjoined by his master not to let a creature into the house during his absence, Joe hoars with indifference the repeated knockings at the door by thirsty souls in search of something to drink, and desires them to leave. They, for the most part, act upon the hint; but one, more importunate than the rest, still hammers at the portula. The unfortunate has forgotten the beer until too late to procure it, and in tones of anguish he implores Joe to supply him with some, as he has beef-steak-pudding for dinner. Joe, however, coolly "putting off his cares," requests him to postpone his dinner until six o'clock, or to fall to at his savory comfort without the desired draughts of cerevisia. Joe's dolce far niente, however, is broken in upon by Jenima (Mrs. Keeley), the housemaid, who has invited a few friends to pass the afternoon, and who endeavours to win over Joe to her cause by acting upon his tender susceptibilities. Joe, however, shows that conscience may reside even in the bosom of a potboy, and having a profound reverence for Queen, Lords, and Commons in Parliament assembled, and a devout belief in the laws framed by them for his guidance and protection, stoutly refuses to open the door to Jenima's friends. This resolution serves him not long, in good stead—he falls a victim to the "blind bowman," and speedily gives entrance to the following parties:—Simkins (Mary Ann's young man), Mr. Hastings; Micawbes (that keeps company with Jane), Mr. Le Barr; Bolter (a military gentleman attached to Susan), Mr. Wayo; Mary Ann (from No. 7 round the corner), Miss Laidlaw; Jane (from the greengrocer's), Mrs. Garden; Susan (from over the way), Miss Thompson. Festivities are now the order of the day, Joe, thinking too busy "as well be executed for an entire mutton as suffer suspension for a delicate lamb," supplies the company with liquor. The harmony, however, is speedily broken by the discordant voice of a traveller without, demanding admission, and, as he backs his request by an appeal to the police, he is immediately admitted, the convivial party having fled to the kitchen for safety and concealment. The person admitted is Mr. Cornelius O'Grigger (Mr. Paul Hefford), who, while he is awaiting the coming of some refreshment, discovers a description of himself inserted in the newspaper, from which we learn that he has been concerned in the transfer of certain stock at Liverpool—in having eased an unsuspecting emigrant of a carpet-bag containing several ounces of gold-dust, which carpet-bag Cornelius has in his present possession. In spite of his disguise, Jenima recognises in him a quondam sweetheart who, after borrowing her savings, made himself scarce. Matters, nevertheless, are made up between the parties, and the former guests again betake themselves to their enjoyment, the party being increased by the company of Cornelius, who is not long in upsetting the prevailing good humour. His attentions to Jenima are so marked, that the jealous ire of Joe is aroused; an altercation ensues, and the police, headed by "mine host" Butts, appear upon the scene and scatter the belligerents in dismay. Jenima endeavours to account for the spirits-and-water by saying that she and Joe had been regaling themselves. There is nothing illegal in this; but the tobacco-pipes are produced, the bowls hot, the narcotic weed still smouldering. Nothing remains for Jenima but to carry the matter through; with surpassing effrontery she declares she had joined Joe in a pipe. To prove this, Butts causes her to smoke in his presence. This point was achieved by Mrs. Keeley in a manner impossible to describe, and the plaudits which followed made the house ring again. As Jenima cannot account for the sound of voices heard by the police, she resorts to subterfuge, and introduces her friends as travellers—one as Ida Pfeiffer, the lady voyager round the world, another as Captain Cook, and so on through the whole round of them. This ruse does not serve, and Joe, being dragged from under the table with the false whiskers on that had been thrown away by O'Grigger, and carrying the carpet-bag containing the gold-dust, is immediately arrested; but upon matters being explained, the real culprit is handed over to the police, and the promised reward of £200 for his apprehension renders Joe and Jenima independent, and therefore careless of their instant discharge by Butts; and, with an appeal to the audience for support, the curtain falls. The onus of the farce rests upon Mr. and Mrs. Keeley, and therefore it is but necessary to say that every point was made to tell; at the conclusion they were called before the curtain. Paul Bedford gave full breadth to his character, though it would have been as well not to have made it that of an Irishman. Mr. R. Romer did ample justice to the landlord, Butts. The other characters were well sustained. Mark Lemon's admirable farce of "The Camp at Chobham" followed; and Mr. Robert Brough's extravaganza, "Mephistopheles," brought the entertainments to a termination. The house was crowded.

DRURY-LANE: JULLIEN'S CONCERTS.—On Monday night Jullien once more made his appearance within the walls of old Drury. Two years have almost passed away since the "Mons." wielded his magic bâton as orchestral chief at his popular promenade concerts; during this period Jullien has visited our Transatlantic brethren, and created in their minds as favourable an impression as he has long made here with us on English ground. Time and travel, by no means improvers of the "human form divine," have left Jullien unscathed, lulled, perhaps, to rest by the "sweet sounds" he so ably controls. He is the same Jullien as heretofore—white cravat, unsnatched vest and all, as usual. His first appearance, sprightly-like, from the trap-door which gives ingress to the orchestra, was the signal for a house crowded to the ceiling on the opening of the doors, to set up a perfect hurricane of cheers; hats and handkerchiefs were waved, while the favoured object of this ovation gracefully acknowledged the plaudits. A simple bowing was not sufficient; therefore the sinister side of the flowing snowy vest was feelingly pressed by the dexter fore-finger, thus conveying an intimation that the enthusiastic reception had reached the heart of the incomparable conductor of concerts. The programme on the occasion was selected with that tact and taste which ever mark Jullien's musical entertainments, being a skilful admixture of the higher range of composition with the tickling and pleasing strains of the dance; and in this blending lies, we humbly imagine, the secret of Jullien's success, and of the change which he has unquestionably wrought in our musical taste and appreciation. Long and learned symphonies, which erst would have been voted bores, are now listened to with eagerness, their beauties discovered and fully enjoyed by the varied audiences which throng the theatre. Selections from Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and other "great ones" in the "divine art," were admirably given, as also was a culling from Jullien's lively dance repertoire, such as the Californian Quadrille, the Katy Did Polka, and others composed during the American campaign. The orchestra is as large and as efficiently served as it was two years ago. Among its members we noticed many new faces, and recognised some old ones. The promenade is fitted up with the usual tasteful elegance, and the reading-room is still continued, well supplied with newspapers from all parts of the world. As we have said, the house was crowded—indeed, five minutes after the doors were opened, standing-room was hardly to be obtained.

ASTLEY'S.—The Battle of Alma is still and deservedly attracting tremendous houses. While noticing this theatre, we must mention the loss it has recently sustained in the death of Mr. Widdicombe, the celebrated "Master of the Ring."

CONCERT BY THE BAND OF THE "GUIDES."—This celebrated band, having been permitted to delay their departure for that purpose, gave a grand performance on Thursday night at Exeter Hall, for the benefit of "the French Charitable Association," under the patronage of the French ambassador and the Countess Walewski. They played a selection of overtures, marches, and other pieces, admirably arranged for their instruments by their able director, M. Mohr; beginning with "God save the Queen" and "Partant pour la Syrie," which latter was called for with loud acclamations from every part of the hall. The principal pieces they played were the overtures to "Guillaume Tell" and "Zampa," a fantasia from "Le Prophète," the "Benediction des Poignards," from the "Huguenots," a quadrille, consisting of old French airs, cleverly arranged by M. Mohr; a Tyrolean air, with variations, composed by him; and a very charming Spanish bolero. Several other things were executed with perfection, and received by a crowded audience with demonstrations of enthusiastic admiration.

FROM MADAME SONTAG.—Extract from a private letter:—"Vera Cruz, Oct. 4th.—One great subject of conversation here for the last week has been Madame Sontag. Her husband departed from Mexico immediately after her death, leaving the remains behind. The coffin containing them has been brought to this place by one of the ordinary carriers' carts, like any common package, having been valued in the carrier's invoice at 200 dollars. On its arrival here it was first placed in the church of St. Augustine, but being found offensive it was taken without any ceremony, religious or other, to a deserted church outside the town, to wait the consent of some ship's captain to convey it to Europe; as yet none has been found who would admit it into his vessel. Assuredly if this poor lady did not anticipate in her childhood that she should become one day une grande dame of world-wide celebrity, she can have dreamt still less of the indignities her remains have been subjected to—such as the poorest peasant would sacrifice everything to spare any member of his family."

A NEW TRAGEDY BY SHAKESPEARE.—The spirit of the bard of Avon, it appears, has lately been revisiting "the glimpses of the moon," in the prosecution of his old profession of play-wright. We extract the startling intelligence from an article in the Alta California on spiritual manifestations, in the course of which we are informed that a regular five-act tragedy, consisting of some 4,000 lines, has recently been written, under spirit impulse, by the hand of Mr. Isaac C. Pray. It purports to emanate from the spirit of Shakespeare! It was read to the manager of the Broadway Theatre and a select number of critics and editors, among whom was the editor of the New York Times, and we understand that all concurred in awarding to it literary merit of a very high order. One of them, as we understand, went so far in his admiration as to declare his belief that no living writer could equal it. It was written with great rapidity, and very few erasures or alterations are to be found upon the manuscript.

DEATH OF A PUBLIC CHARACTER IN THE WORKHOUSE.—On Wednesday the well-known dwarf, "Welshman Jones," who has been exhibited and formed an object of popular interest throughout Great Britain and Ireland for the past thirty years, died in the infirmary of the Kilkenny Union Workhouse.—Kilkenny Moderator.

PROVINCIAL.

CONSECRATION OF ST. MARY'S CHURCH, BRANKSEA.—(See page 1049.)

At the entrance of Poole Harbour, on the coast of Dorset, is the small island of Branksea, the population of which has increased, within a few years, from about twelve to 200 inhabitants. The principal edifice is Branksea Castle, the residence of Colonel Waugh, the present possessor of the island, and commodore of the Poole Yacht Club. Upon this sequestered spot, in July, 1853, General Sir Harry Smith laid the foundation of a church, of beautiful design, which was consecrated by the Lord Bishop of the diocese on the 18th of Oct. The island, with its castle, and the church nestled among the hills and trees, are visible to vessels proceeding up the harbour, and by their picturesque never fail to attract the tourist's admiration. The island is about seven miles in circumference, is well wooded, and has three fresh-water lakes, the largest being formed by Colonel Waugh, in his intake of 100 acres of land reclaimed from the sea. In Hutchins's "History of Dorset," the island is described from the date of Domesday-book; and here are recorded many visits of royal and noble personages. The ancient portion of the castle is the central square tower, the walls of which are twelve feet thick. The castle has been entirely remodelled and superbly decorated by Colonel Waugh, and contains several fine pictures. The labourers employed by the gallant colonel reside with their families on the estate, and the pipe-clay pits and kilns afford them abundant employment.

To provide this industrious population, as well as the Preventive Service, and the inmates of the castle, with accommodation for public worship, the church at Branksea has been erected at the sole expense of Colonel Waugh, who also gave the site and an endowment of £75 per annum, to which the Government has added £25, on account of the Coast-guard Station.

On the 2nd July, 1853, Lieut.-General Sir Harry Smith, G.C.B., laid the foundation stone of the edifice consecrated on the 18th. The occasion was a joyous one, for though a thousand voices swelled the air, in singing the hymn so appropriately written for, and sung after the ceremony, yet the afternoon and evening of the 2nd of July was devoted to the dance, and it was indeed a gala day; the noble liberality of Col. and Mrs. Waugh having prepared abundance of refreshments to enliven and support the energy of the joyous dancers.

On Wednesday, the 18th of Oct., all was holy solemnity, even the weather with its gloom did not effect the solemn scene.

The hazy atmosphere seemed to threaten a repetition of the weather of Tuesday. The intense interest, however, which this matter had created amongst all classes in Poole, overcome their misgivings as to the weather, and at ten o'clock, the time appointed for the starting from Poole quay, the Purbeck steamer, which the gallant colonel had engaged for the occasion to convey parties to the Island, was uncomfortably filled, and the engineer put off to sea in the presence of many parties on the quay who had intended to have taken the first trip. Case's cornopian band was engaged for the day and commenced playing a few minutes before ten o'clock, on board the steamer, the National Anthem, Rule Britannia, &c. As the first journey took somewhat longer than was expected the Purbeck did not arrive the second time till after eleven o'clock.

On arriving at the island, the clergy and gentry repaired to the castle, where the former habited themselves in their surplices, &c., and at about half-past ten o'clock the assembled company moved towards the church in the following.

The procession was arranged by Capt. Maxwell, R.N., E. Brown Esq., and Messrs. Blanchard and Short.

All the Branksea school children, boys and girls, thirty-six in number, were dressed alike, in a simple pretty style by their kind benefactress, Mrs. Waugh, and the nice appearance they presented with their flags and banners, added to the beauty and interest of the procession.

On the procession reaching the gates of the churchyard, the foremost ranks moved back, and the bishop, attended by his chaplains, was there received in the prescribed way, and a petition duly signed was delivered to him, praying that he would consecrate the church and the burial-ground thereto belonging. The petition having been read, and the bishop having signified his intention of consecrating the church and the burial-ground, he, with the clergy, and others attending upon him, proceeded up the aisle towards the communion-table, repeating the 24th Psalm alternately as they proceeded, the bishop commencing.

The organ which was situated in the tower, immediately over Colonel Waugh's family pew, was beautifully played by E. Brown, Esq., and the choir was composed of the young ladies from the castle, together with Sir Ivor Guest, Miss Guest, and a few friends. Jackson's "Te Deum," and Crotch's "Sanctus," was very well performed.

The following hymn, composed expressly for the occasion by Miss Maxwell, and to which E. Brown, Esq., set the music, was sung.

Within the courts of God's own house
We meet on this auspicious day,
To celebrate the finished work
Where we may praise God's (name and pray.

The solemn consecration o'er,
With true devotion let us sing
Hosannah to the Lord on High,
Glory to Christ our Heavenly King.

Now with thank-offerings of joy
Let great Jehovah's name be praised,
For dedicated here to Him
A temple to the Lord is raised.

May holy love within our hearts
Burn with a bright and heavenly flame,
And ever in our island church
Adored be our Redeemer's name.

The consecration service is in itself a most beautiful one, and befits the dignity of the occasion of dedicating a temple to our God, and we were deeply impressed with the whole scene and service. The bishop, in full canonicals, supported and assisted by thirty clergymen, was in itself impressive, and the beautiful edifice, crowded to the very porch, and the assembled worshippers hushed into profound silence, attuned the feelings to the holy service. All was in perfect harmony, the measured tone of the clergy swelling through the space where never before such sacred words had been heard, the organ and choir filling church, and nave, and tower, with devout harmonious sounds.

The lord bishop's sermon was befitting the occasion, and the solemn, earnest, powerful delivery was indeed soul-stirring. It was from 1st Corinthians, ii. 2, "But it is written, eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for them that love him."

From the beginning, when the whole worshippers marched in solemn procession from the castle to the holy temple, a part of the ceremony which struck us as peculiarly beautiful, and of which we heard many expressions of admiration—to the conclusion when the bishop and numerous clergy passed over the ground, dedicated to burial, and consecrating it, finished the ceremony, all was in perfect accord with the occasion.

DESCRIPTION OF THE CHURCH.

The church, built by Mr. Blanchard, of Poole, is undoubtedly one of the handsomest in the diocese of Sarum. Everything throughout it is of the richest and most costly character, and evidences that no expense has been spared in making it a place worthy of the worship of God, and the beautiful island and picturesque scenery which surround it.

It is a neat Gothic building, with square towers, surmounted with a small octagon turret. It is built we believe, to accommodate about 150 persons though on Wednesday 306 tickets of admission were taken at the doors.

On entering the sacred edifice the stranger is particularly struck with the richness and beauty of the windows. Those of our readers who visited the Great Exhibition may recollect (for who that saw it could forget?) an elegant painting exhibited by Mr. E. Baillie, representing Shakespeare in the act of reading one of his plays to Queen Elizabeth; the richness of the colouring, beautiful softness of the shades, the combinations of light and shade, and the exact perspective, marked it out as a work that could have but few to rival it. Mr. Baillie and his partner, Mr. Mayer, are the artists whom Col. Waugh has selected to furnish the stained windows, of which the following account, though brief, may suffice to give some idea of their magnificence. The windows are in that style called the decorative Gothic, which, more than any other of the Gothic styles, exhibits the most graceful lines and affords the best play for the imagination of the decorator. The east window, which, for its extreme beauty, is the first that strikes us on our entrance, has four openings, each opening being devoted to the illustration of a scene in the life of Christ. The first represents the Transfiguration, on which the brilliancy of the light poured through the halo has an effect altogether unique. The second represents the Crucifixion, and here, as also in the third, which portrays the Descent from the Cross, the artists have been as effective in their shades as in the first they were in their lights. The fourth again is one that, exhibiting the Ascension of our Lord, affords opportunity for brilliancy of colouring. The grouping, therefore, of the four drawings is such as to give them the best effect. Now have the traceries above, which give such an opportunity for setting off the lower part of the window, been forgotten. Besides ornamental lights, which can only be appreciated by a consideration of the general effect they produce on the whole, one of these openings is devoted to a representation of the dove descending surrounded by glory, and another to allegorical emblems of Alpha and Omega. Turning to the south chancel window, with its two openings, we have somewhat different designs presented. Here are the Four Evangelists, with their emblematic devices, introduced in a geometrical pattern of vine leaves, which is finely softened by a chequered background. Around the medallions runs a richly beaded border, like jets of light, giving to the whole a pleasing effect. If one thing more than another in this window struck us, it was the richness of the drapery, which we do not think the east window excels. The west window has three openings, one subject, that of Christ Blessing Little Children, being made to extend over the whole three. Here, again, we see the hand of a master. The traceries are very appropriately filled by the arms of the family of Colonel Waugh.

The nave windows, which are not of course intended or required to be greatly ornamented, have geometrical patterns of various kinds, with emblematic devices at the head. Of these we may say they were necessary to give effect to the others, and they serve well this office. Over the tower at the entrance will be observed a large quatre-foil beautiful for its brilliancy and richness. There are similar perforations, similarly adorned, in various parts of the tower. On the whole, the window decorations reflect the highest credit on the artists who have designed and executed them with such taste and skill.

At the west end of the church, directly under the tower, is situated the castle family pew, which is 13 feet square. It is divided from the nave by a most handsomely carved perforated oak screen. In the pew are ten carved oak chairs—on the backs of five of them is beautifully executed the arms of the family of Mrs. Waugh, and on the other five, the arms of the gallant colonel—and in the middle of the pew is a carved octagon table. It may be interesting to the stranger visiting this place to know that the roof of this pew is composed of part of the roof of the council chamber of Crosby Hall, London; the council chamber of Richard III., and the gothic tracery there displayed, cannot but arrest the attention of the most unobservant. The walls of the pew are of carved oak panelling. The effect, on the whole, is greatly heightened by the very splendid fire-place and the admirable oil painting of the Crucifixion, the value of which we are unable to learn, but it is undoubtedly of great worth. Around the painting is an inscription, inserted within the traceries of the tracery, as follows:—"When thou hadst overcome the sharpness of death, thou didst open the kingdom of heaven to all believers." We also noticed here two groups of figures, in carved oak, one representing "Susannah and the Elders," "Offering of the Wise Men."

The nave is fitted with curved open seats, and in the south-west corner, is a very beautiful purbeck marble font of considerable size, with oak cover. The pulpit in the north-east corner, and the reading-desk in the south-east corner, of the nave are also fine specimens of workmanship. They are very handsomely carved, and the pulpit cushion is of crimson velvet richly embroidered with gold fringe. Before leaving the nave, we would also notice that over each of the porches, doorways, and windows are texts of Scripture painted in a decorative style, in church text. The length of the nave, between the two screens, is about 40 feet.

The chancel is divided from the nave by a similar screen to that which divides the castle pew from the nave. The chancel walls are of carved oak, panelled. The pavement is of purbeck marble and tessellated pavement. The communion rail is of carved oak tracery, and two fine executed altar chairs are here placed; on the back of one of them are the letters I.H.S. on the other a wreath of thorns and three nails. The cloth of the communion table is composed of handsome silk scarlet velvet, embroidered with gold; over the table are four tablets mounted in carved oak frames, on which are inscribed in old English letters the Apostles' Creed, the Ten Commandments, and the Lord's Prayer, and, as a finish to the above, we may mention a very handsome Communion Service which has been given by the colonel and his lady, presented for the service of the church. The chancel is about 14 feet square.

The vestry adjoins the chancel and is separated by a handsomely carved door. The room is small, but the fittings here are quite in accordance with the other parts of the edifice.

The carvings were executed by Mr. Gwynne, and the tablets, inscriptions, &c., by Messrs. Baillie and Mayer, who prepared the splendid windows of the church.

THE DEJUNER.

In the large billiard-room at the top of the castle, was laid out a most sumptuous repast. The banquet had everything that taste and elegance could bestow on the most favoured guests, the room was splendidly adapted for such a reception.

The fresco roof, the tapestry walls, made the mind recur back to olden times, when such tapestry was new, and perhaps had, had the same scenes of reflection in other hands enacted before it, hundreds of years now passed and gone.

On the repast being over, Colonel Waugh rose and proposed the first loyal toast—the Queen, which was received in the most patriotic manner by the assembled guests.

Colonel Waugh then rose and said, that he did not wish to make the present an occasion of giving toasts, but he conceived it to be his duty to thus publicly thank the Lord Bishop of the diocese for his kindness in assisting Mrs. Waugh and himself to carry out their views and wishes relative to the consecration of this their little island church. But a short year since, and a gallant chief was here present to lay the foundation stone of this edifice, the finishing stone of which has been set a seal to this day by consecration, at the hands of the right reverend prelate. For the warm support he had received from the lord bishop in his official capacity, and for his kindness, if he might say so, as a friend, he begged to tender him the warmest thanks of Mrs. Waugh and himself. It would ill become him, in the presence of his lordship, to expatiate on his many virtues and on his high endowments, he having attained to nearly the highest position that a dignitary of the church can aspire to; but they all knew that he looked to a far higher reward in the world to come. He (the gallant colonel) requested the company to charge their glasses, and begged of them to empty them in drinking "health, long life, and prosperity to the Right Reverend the Lord Bishop of Salisbury."

The toast having been duly honoured, The Lord Bishop rose and said that he begged to express his warmest thanks for the kindly feeling expressed towards him by Lieutenant Colonel and Mrs. Waugh. This was hardly a time for bandying compliments, but still he could not pass over the present occasion without making some such remarks. It seldom occurred, he said, that the munificence of one individual had been so evinced as it had been now by the erection of such a beautiful church as that to which he had set his seal to-day, and by so doing the colonel had wiped away the disgrace of former owners of this island, by providing at his sole expense what was to conduce to the honour of God, and to the spiritual benefit and education of all the residents on the island, so complete in all its parts, that he might firmly say, that from one end to the other there was nothing but of the most worthy character, showing, as it did, that he had thought nothing too good to be dedicated to God's service. Sir H. Smith had laid the foundation-stone, yet the finishing one it had been his privilege to seal to-day in his office of head of the diocese. It was a great pleasure to him to feel that Colonel Waugh had served his country as a soldier; yet he had not forgotten the service he owed to his Heavenly Master, and he must say that he had acted throughout in the most friendly, sober, and straightforward manner possible, and if others would follow his example, the burden of his office, would be very much lightened, and he earnestly hoped that the clergy and lay members of his diocese would profit by the zeal and devotedness to the cause of our common religion, which they had seen so nobly evinced in the present instance.

Admiral Brown rose and proposed the health of General

Sir Harry Smith, Bart., G.C.B., which was received by the company.

Colonel Waugh was about to return thanks, but was prevented from the want of time. The night setting in, and the weather becoming somewhat boisterous, the assembly were anxious to move.

H. D. Seymour, Esq., M.P., then rose and said that Colonel Waugh had wished him, as he was somewhat connected with this locality, to propose the health of the rev. gentleman who was to be the future minister of the beautiful church which they had that day met to consecrate. He thought, from the auspicious circumstances which had hitherto attended this place, that the duties of the rev. gentleman would be very pleasant, and he hoped that he would long live to fulfil the duties which would devolve upon him, and that the youth of the island would be trained up by him.

The Rev. Mr. Louth, in replying, expressed his earnest thanks for the kind expressions which had been made towards him. He did not think that he should have been called upon to speak in public further than his ministrations in the morning, though he had heard a hint of the kind. He expressed his gratitude to the Colonel and Mrs. Waugh for the kindness shown towards him. He was the minister of one of the most splendid islands and temples in the country, and he hoped that he should bring up the young who would be committed to his charge in the "nurture and admonition of the Lord."

During the dejeuner, Case's band took up their station in front of the castle, and performed Handel's "Hallelujah Chorus," Haydn's "The Heavens are telling the glory of God," "Before Jehovah's awful throne," "Luther's hymns," "Russia," "Poland," &c.

There was an abundant supply of rounds and surloins of beef, veal, pies, &c., in several of the rooms below, which was partaken of by a number of the visitors, tradesmen, and mechanics.

We feel our inequality to do justice to the noble, high-minded proprietors of Branksen Island, Colonel and Mrs. Waugh, who, having many dependants under their care, and provided for by them, deemed it right and fit, and a sacred duty, to provide also a church for the growing community, thus wiping away the reproach that had so long hung over this otherwise favoured isle. Now, through their generous munificence, a temple has been raised, worthy of being dedicated to the Most High, where their happy dependants will henceforth meet to hear the glad tidings of salvation preached; and, when years have passed by, and Colonel and Mrs. Waugh are gathered to their forefathers, what grander monument could be erected over them, to tell of their virtues, than the good deed of building "a habitation to the Lord," where generations, yet unborn, may learn that devotion which may fit and prepare them to become inhabitants of heaven? All who were favoured like ourselves by being present at the consecration of St. Mary's Church, would not readily forget that day.

The service was performed on the following Sabbath by the new incumbent, the Rev. A. Lenth, who preached a most appropriate and affecting sermon with his wonted fine powerful delivery. The bells rang for the first time on the Lord's day on Branksen Island, and the little knots of inhabitants passing along under the shade of the noble trees made one almost fancy that it was some old village church whose bells called its worshippers Sabbath after Sabbath, under its roof-tree to worship, whereas last Sunday was the first during all time that the rich-toned bell had called the dwellers around to prayer.

THE BAND OF THE IMPERIAL REGIMENT OF GUIDES AT WINDSOR CASTLE.—A treat of the most gratifying character was experienced on the grand promenade at Windsor Castle terrace on Sunday afternoon. The band of the Imperial Guides, fifty-six in number, at a special invitation of her Majesty, came to Windsor at one o'clock by a special train of first-class carriages from the Waterloo station, whither they were attended by Sergeant Marion, of the Fusilier Guards, who acted as their interpreter; they were also attended by six privates of the Imperial Guides. The band was under the directorship of Captain Moler, their bandmaster. On their arrival at the Castle they were conducted to the Queen's Riding School, which had been fitted up for their reception, and where they partook of luncheon. At three o'clock they assembled on the terrace, and played alternately with the band of the Royal Horse Guards, under the directorship of Mr. Tutton, their master. After the performance of two or three pieces, her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, with the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the other junior branches of the Royal family, made their appearance on the eastern terrace. The band of the Guides immediately struck up the National Anthem, which was rendered in a very effective manner. Her Majesty was accompanied by his Serene Highness Prince Nicholas of Nassau, the Earl of Aberdeen, Colonel Seymour, Colonel Drummond, Colonel Biddulph, Lady Emily Seymour, and others of the Royal suite. The Queen, observing the Baron de Verdière, Captain of the Emperor's staff, and the Baron Videl, one of the officers of the Guides, with the band, sent Colonel Biddulph, to request their attendance, and they were most graciously received by her Majesty and the Prince, with whom they conversed some time, and afterwards joined the Royal suite in the promenade. These gentlemen had the honour of being invited to dine with her Majesty in the evening. The Queen remained on the terrace until half past four o'clock, when she came amongst the company on the grand terrace, and afterwards proceeded into the park by the southern archway, the Guides playing the National Anthem, and the Royal Horse Guards playing the French melody of "Partant pour la Syrie." The terrace was crowded to excess. The Guides, fraternising with Mr. Tutton, of the Royal Horse Guards, then left for the Riding School, where they deposited their instruments, and afterwards went to the Castle, and partook of a sumptuous repast in the pages' room, where they drank the healths of the Queen and the Emperor, and at half-past six returned to town.

FORMATION OF A PERMANENT CAMP.—It is intended to construct forthwith a permanent camp at Aldershot, near to the site of the Chobham camp of last year, and also to erect some important artillery defences to Portsmouth and the adjacent coast. The camp at Aldershot will comprise barracks, magazines, and other buildings necessary for the accommodation of 10,000 men. This will include two regiments of cavalry, detachment of horse and foot artillery, and infantry. The works are to be proceeded with with all dispatch, and it is reported that £10,000 will be spent upon this camp by March next.

WINDSOR BOWLING-GREEN DINNER.—The members of the Winslow Bowling-green Club terminated their season with a dinner at the George Inn, under the presidency of Mr. Cole. Host Bartou, always alive to the comfort of his guests, provided an abundance of creature comforts. Success to the club was, with veteran feeling, given by Mr. Cowley, who had been a member for nearly sixty years. J. Denno and W. S. Bowen, Esqs., were elected stewards for next season. A cheerful and pleasant evening was passed ere "to our next merry meeting" was given.

SCOTLAND.

THE TITLE OF THE CHIEF MAGISTRATE OF EDINBURGH.—It will be seen, from the Town Council proceedings, that our hint to the Lord Provost as to the indignity cast upon his office in the late royal commission in omitting the title "lord" from his designation, has been duly attended to, and that the result is perfectly satisfactory. The imperial officials are hereafter to be more careful how they deal with our Scottish titles. The conduct of the Lord Provost in this matter entitles him to the thanks not merely of the Town Council, but of the whole community. Trifling as the thing may appear in itself, it is not difficult to see how a succession of such trifles might aid in denuding the office of all its influence and dignity, a result which would be most injurious to the community.—North British Daily Mail.

EDINBURGH, Oct. 30.—The interesting experiment made by the proprietors of the Tay salmon fishings upon the ova of that fish is reported to be proceeding most favourably. At a meeting of the proprietors, held a few days ago, it was stated that on the 22nd of December the breeding boxes contained about 400,000 ova; these, having been carefully protected, gave birth, in March and April, to swarms of parr, which have been nourished with great care and attention, and are now beginning to reach the size and assume the silvery appearance of the salmon smolt; next season they will probably be allowed to go down to the sea with their brethren born in the freer and less carefully tended breeding-places selected by the parent fish themselves, and then the success of the experiment will be tested by observing whether the increase in the number of grilse and salmon corresponds with the increased supply of smolt turned into the river. At the same meeting the proprietors resolved to close the fishing season in the Tay by the 26th of August, in place of the 14th of September, the present statutory period. It is sincerely to be hoped that all these various devices will have the desired effect of restoring the salmon fishings to something like their former success and value; but the real cause of their decline, and one which it is difficult for the river proprietors successfully to combat, is the stake-nets at the mouths of the river, which, sanctioned though they have been by the judgment of the law, certainly do seem strongly to infringe the rights of the river proprietors by directly and irretrievably injuring their property.

IRELAND.

PART OF THE FORTIFICATIONS OF SEBASTOPOLIS IN CARLOW.—During the last week we had the gratification of inspecting a small piece of granite which formed part of the fortifications of Sebastopol, it having been sent to some friends in this locality by our gallant countrymen, Captain Shrivington. It is similar to the granite of this country, but much softer; and if we may judge of this as a specimen we would be led to infer that Sebastopol and its fortifications are not likely to hold out long against the batteries of the English and French artillery.—Carlow Sentinel.

RECRUITS.—The public spirit in Ireland in favour of the present war is such that the vast majority of recruits insist on joining regiments in active service, comparatively few being ready to serve in regiments which are not at the seat of war. The allowance given to the sergeant or other party for procuring a recruit is £1 if for a regiment engaged in the war, and 15s. for all other regiments. Men are now taken in the army whose height does not exceed 5 feet 4 four inches.

MR. SMITH O'BRIEN.—Among the passengers between Malta and Gibraltar by the Candia, which has just arrived home with the Indian mail, was Mr. Smith O'Brien, returned from transportation. He arrived from Australia via Madras. He was a first-class passenger on board the Candia, and entered into familiar conversation with those on board on every topic except politics. He looked careworn. He was obliged to leave the Candia at Gibraltar, as he is prohibited, by the terms of his pardon, from visiting the United Kingdom. It was believed that he purposed visiting some part of Italy. He appeared sad on leaving the steamer; and, while wishing good bye to those who were bound for England, he remarked that he scarcely knew what countryman to call himself.

Foreign Intelligence.

FRANCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Thursday, Nov. 2.

Our no-news from the East—The "Timid Councils" mistake—The Guides band in London—The "Cent-Guides" dwelling—Cheap skimmers in Paris—Crucelli—Jules Janin and "Figaro"—Another mistake—Noir race-course.

THE want of official or authentic news from the heights of Sebastopol is producing serious feelings, amounting almost to consternation in Paris—the intelligence through St. Petersburg and Berlin, being naturally little calculated to reassure the public in this part of the world—and it is difficult to persuade people that the allied commanders would allow their countrymen to remain so long in painful uncertainty, without some positive reason for concealment. It is more than probable, however, that before the time this reaches the public eye, the fall of the city will have been officially published—the last mail from the East having brought a letter in cypher to the Emperor from General Canrobert, which, though the contents were of course not made known, was evidently very satisfactory, as his Majesty is understood to have told the officers around him, that they might expect to hear of the fall of Sebastopol before the close of the week. In addition to which, the Court invitations to Compiegne—which had been issued for the beginning of last week, and countermanded in consequence of the non-arrival of satisfactory news—have been issued anew; but for what date I am not exactly informed. One of the worst practical results of this protracted silence, is the snipe it affords to gambling at the Bourse—stock-jobbing speculations having been carried on for the last few weeks to the most furious extent, as the next settling day will be likely to prove.

A considerable sensation was created here, particularly among the English, by the allusion to the "timid councils" in his Majesty's letter to Madame de St. Arnaud. It was looked upon as directed against the hesitating policy of the English Government, and, in fact, as denoting a coolness between the two allies, which the friends of Russia and others—with whom the city abounds—beheld with uncontrollable gratification. Fortunately, the explanation of the Emperor, which, it is said, was provoked by a foolish paragraph in a London journal, removed all apprehensions on the subject, and put all square again. The truth is, "timides avis" was a lapsus calami—a mistake.

M. Soult's trip back to London from Calais, on being refused admittance into this country, has also occasioned a little flurry among diplomatic circles. Mr. Mason, the United States' minister, had an audience of the Emperor on the subject, but without the least chance of any modification in the resolve of the Government towards M. Soult.

The cordial reception given to the band of the Guides by the London public at the Crystal Palace has produced the best effect here, though a little damped by the treatment one or two of them are said to have experienced by the Cockney mob at Julien's concert on Monday last. Under pretence of the extreme friendliness of these fine-hearted, hospitable fellows, one of those sons of Apollo is said to have found himself minus his gold watch. The new body-guard, or Cent Gardes, of the Emperor, are, I regret to say, extremely unpopular with the rest of the army. They are quartered at Versailles, where a large body of Carabiniers are likewise stationed. The high pay of the former, 1s. 10d. a day, the latter receiving but 2½d., has caused much heart-burning, and not a day passes without two or three duels between the Platorians and their less-favoured comrades; in fact the great hundred are now reduced to eighty-five, and a mot of the Carabiniers is quoted, which promises no speedy termination to this bellum intracivium—"Ils ne sont que cent, nous en viendrons bientôt à bout."

The Exposition of next year is absolutely turning the heads of the speculating public in Paris. Prospectuses are daily publishing of new schemes to "chaperon," lodge, and feed—particularly the last—the hosts that are expected to visit us on the occasion. One association—engaging to provide prime dinners, including a bottle of good, and half a bottle of expensive, wine, at three francs and a-half per head—was filled up, and every share taken by the day (Saturday last) fixed for the closing of the books. The shares, which were only twenty-five francs each, are now at a considerable premium; but the price of the dinner (three and a-half francs) is considered high for Paris, and, in fact, it is not cheap, considering the dinners you find at the Palais Royal and other places so much cheaper. In consequence of this, several rival societies have started up, and, if there be faith in programmes, you are assured of a most capital dinner of the best viands and choicest cookery, with, in addition, the name of the wine-grower on every cork, for two francs, including the gratuity to the waiter. The elaborate statements of the prices of meats and wines are published with the proposal, and would really seem to prove that, with a fair number of consommateurs, a very large profit may accrue at that moderate charge. Breakfasts are to be had at proportional rates. Touching breakfast: wine to the poor traveller who puts his trust in Paris tea-makers on this plan! The modus operandi by which this beverage is prepared for the human palate is a secret as yet unknown to the "natives," as in the days of Charlemagne. All these schemes take immensely, and will no doubt have the effect of cheapening a visit to Paris in the anno mirabili 1855. On the subject of cheap eating, one really remarkable fact may be cited—to wit, that in the Rue de la Bourse there is a "restaurant" where you may dine off beef, mutton, or veal—which is exhibited every day in the window before dinner—of excellent quality, take half a bottle of wine, and have your dessert of fruit or cheese, for one franc! The devil of this place is, that it is always so full that you have to faire queue for a place, not at all pleasant for a hungry candidate for the honours of the déjeûner.

Nothing new of Crucelli; but there are strange stories about town, in which official names are mentioned in relation with the fair fugitive. As they may be false, it is as well just now not to repeat the circumstances reported. One thing seems positive, namely, that a statement is to be laid before the head of the Government, which must lead to a delicate investigation concerning the administration of the Grand Opera, at least. How much further the inquiry will be carried respecting the other theatres is not at present known.

On the subject of theatrical scandal, a curious affair has arisen out of the late exposé made by the Figaro of the musical critic, who sold his eulogiums to Mme. T— of the Grand Opera, for 8,000 francs per annum, as you published at the time. The Figaro, in describing the disgraceful traffic, drew a sketch of this "gentleman of the press," under the mask of the infamous Italian libellist, Arétin. The likeness was so marked, that no one with half an eye could be deceived in that portrait; when, to the great surprise of the writer, and not less so to the rest of the world, M. Jules Janin, the well-known critic of the Journal des Débats, insisted that the sketch must have been intended for him, and notwithstanding the disclaimer of the Figaro, persists in claiming the unenviable resemblance; which, very fortunately for the reputation of J. J., exists solely in his own imagination, and, to crown the absurdity actually, forces the writer before the tribunals for a libel upon him.

"— Now, by two-headed Janus, Nature hath made strange fellows in her time!"

It will be within the recollection of your readers, that the establishment of a new race-course near Longchamps, in the Bois de Boulogne, was announced in this letter some time since. It has now been opened a few weeks, and although Government have not discarded the use of that vilest of grounds—the Champs de Mars—for the biennial Paris meetings, the Jockey Club, and the principal supporters of the turf in France, have energetically supported the courses at Longchamps, and become members of the "Société des Sports," to whom the new ground belongs. It lies between the Bois de Boulogne and the Seine, which separates it from the Mont Valerien, a large hill, crowned with a fortress of formidable strength, mounting 800 guns. It is well adapted for racing, though a trifle too flat for steepchasing. Elegant and very spacious stands are erected, tastefully decorated with the flags of England, France, and Turkey; but there is the serious drawback about them, that they are so much exposed to the sun that it is not an easy matter for those who occupy them to follow the racing. A meeting took place at Longchamps on Sunday, but it was not of sufficient interest to justify more than a passing record in your columns.

OPENING OF THE ROYAL DANISH RAILWAY, BY THE KING OF DENMARK AND THE ENGLISH CONTRACTORS.

Lowestoft, Sunday Evening, Oct. 29.

Last night the Cygnus, commanded by Captain Raymond, returned to this port, whence she sailed the previous Saturday with a party of English gentlemen interested in the Royal Danish Railway, just opened with great ceremony and éclat, by the King of Denmark.

Among others who accompanied Mr. Peto, were Mr. G. P. Bidder, whose European eminence as an engineer has been recently established in Scandinavian estimation by the Norwegian Grand Trunk Railway; Mr. J. Anderson, deputy chairman of the Royal Danish Company; Mr. F. H. Geach, secretary; Mr. J. V. Gooch, superintendent of the Eastern Counties Railway; and Mr. E. Weedon and Mr. T. H. Wilson, the artists. The Cygnus made the passage in twenty-six hours to the port of Tonnigen (more commonly Tønning), where she arrived at one o'clock on Sunday morning. On Monday after viewing the station, the party on board proceeded to Flensburg, a distance of forty-four miles. Here apartments had been taken at Rahl's Hotel, the style of which fully equalled anything that could be met with in a first-class establishment in any English town of corresponding magnitude. By the new line Tønning, situated in the extreme west of Denmark, on the Eider, is brought in connection with Flensburg, via Husum, containing about 5,000 inhabitants, principally occupied in cattle feeding. From Husum a branch extends to Rendsburg, formerly a border fortress between Holstein and Schleswig, and forms a junction with the Kiel and Altona line; thus becoming the direct route to Hamburg. Rendsburg, built on both sides of the Eider, containing about 10,000 inhabitants, is favourably situated for commerce, this likewise being the point at which the junction of the Schleswig-Holstein Canal with the Eider is effected, and the most cursory glance at the map will show that, at least on geographical grounds, Tønning and Lowestoft are the natural termini of any chain of connection, between the Danish and British metropolis; and on commercial grounds the advantages are not less manifest. Until lately Denmark and Northern Europe could only be reached from London by the long and tedious rail and sea route via Hamburg, or the still more wearying one via Hull to Copenhagen, a distance of 735 miles, the voyage alone occupying three and a-half days at least; while to reach Hamburg, the traveller being then distant from Copenhagen nearly 300 English miles, usually takes about fifty-five hours. On the other hand, from London to Tønning can be accomplished in thirty hours, from thence to Hamburg in six hours, while to Copenhagen is not more than 150 miles, thus shortening the route from London to Hamburg nearly nineteen hours, and to Copenhagen several hundred miles. Considerations connected with cattle breeding in the plains of Jutland and the fattening of those cattle on the pastures of Norfolk, and their transport thence in an undeteriorated state, invest the new enterprise with many features of importance on which it is superfluous to dwell. Tønning, with its thirty miles from Schleswig, and eleven from the mouth of the Eider, though now a small village of some 3,000 inhabitants, must, as the traffic of the line develops, become the most important port in Western Denmark, possessing as it does good depth of water, and being sixty miles nearer the sea than Hamburg, while the advantages of Flensburg as an entrepôt on the shore of the Baltic cannot be over-rated. The traveller from Tønning to Husum is struck with the fertility of the plains on either side of the line, and the immense number of cattle grazing on them. The town of Husum (the principal intermediate station) is of considerable importance, and contains a population of about 5,000, who gain a tolerable subsistence as cattle-feeders. The line between Husum and Flensburg is little worthy of note. Denmark, though essentially an agricultural and corn-producing country, has large tracts of excellent land that now lie bare and waste, which require but little capital and labour to reclaim. On arriving at Flensburg, one of the most interesting and beautifully situated towns the territory of Denmark affords, the traveller is amply repaid for any lack of scenic effect experienced on his route from Tønning. It stands on the bight of a deep gulf running twenty miles inland, and is completely landlocked, so that ships of the greatest draught may lie in safety, there being no rise and fall of tide, and therefore no locks required for loading or unloading, thus rendering Flensburg altogether unsurpassed for commercial purposes. Irrespective of its excellent position, it has many facilities, including admirable yards for shipbuilding, a school of navigation, some good foundries, tobacco factories, sugar refineries, dye, chicory, and vinegar works, distilleries, &c.; together with three market houses and four churches, and nearly 18,000 inhabitants. The improvement they are now most intent upon is the introduction of gas, through the instrumentality of a company, of which Mr. Peto is chairman, that has already lighted eight towns in Denmark in the most satisfactory and economic manner, and in a few days the works here will be in full operation.

It becoming known some few days previous that, notwithstanding the political embroilments in Danish councils just now, the King would accept the proffered hospitality of Mr. Peto, and inaugurate the opening of the line, the Flensburghers made timely and earnest preparations for commemorating the double event, in a manner worthy of its novelty and importance. Processions in the streets and exultations on the house-tops, evergreens and flowers, flags and music, everywhere greeted the ear and caught the eye, while outside, the town the inhabitants clustered in knotted groups, and with their long Dutch pipes hanging from their mouths, manifested their approval of their more systematically busy neighbours in low guttural sounds and commendatory shrugs and nods. His Majesty was expected about three o'clock, on Tuesday, the 21st, but for hours previously the quay was crowded with holiday people, anxiously gazing towards Corser, a distance of about seventy miles, from whence the King would arrive per steamer, and shortly after the appointed time, the fine vessel, the Schleswig, bearing his Majesty and suite, bore in sight—the recognition of the royal standard at the mast-head being announced by the firing of guns and the enthusiastic cheering of the populace. At the landing-place, very handsomely decorated with a profusion of flags, and appropriate floral and other devices, the King was received by Herr Von Rosen, President of Flensburg; his Excellency Herr Von Bulow, Governor General of Schleswig; his Royal Highness the Duke of Glücksburg, Prince William of Glücksburg, and a host of military and municipal functionaries in full uniform. Several regiments of soldiers lined the road from the landing-place to Kaysser's Hotel which had been externally adorned and internally arranged in a manner commensurate with the dignity of a guest so unwonted and important, though it is but right to add that the personal tastes of his Majesty in matters of this sort are exceedingly simple, and his general bearing plain, unpretending, and courteous in a striking degree. The King wore his military uniform, with the star of the order of St. Vladimir, and impressed the English spectator as having many Anglo-physical attributes about him in mien and features, being a corpulent and rather a fusc-looking man. He was accompanied by his consort, the Countess Danner, and chief ministers of his court. Upon landing he bowed gracefully to the multitude, and personally greeted some of his officers. The Royal cortege and suite were then driven to their hotel, from the windows of which he again acknowledged the plaudits of the populace. At night a general illumination of the town took place, to Englishmen of a peculiar character, every window throughout the town being elegantly decorated with flowers, and lighted by, from three to four wax candles in silver or silvered candlesticks; the Burgher's Hall being the only building differently illuminated, having large and well painted allegorical pictures in each window, surrounded with variegated lamps.

Early on Wednesday morning Mr. Peto, Mr. Bidder, and the other gentlemen connected with the railway, were formally presented to his Majesty, surrounded by his staff. The ceremony of introduction having been performed, the gentlemen repaired to the station. Mr. J. S. Louth, the general manager of the line, and the excellence of whose management of the Norfolk line had been recognised by a splendid testimonial from the directors and officers of that company, had converted the whole structure and its approaches into a triumphal arched avenue of the most imposing aspect. Mr. Louth being assisted by Messrs. Peyton, Keogh, and Trery, an accomplished artist. The admiration it excited was unbounded, the profusion of the national colour, red with white cross, being evidently accepted by the King in the spirit the compliment was tendered. About ten o'clock his Majesty and suite proceeded from the hotel in open carriages, escorted by several regiments of soldiers through the town, and continuous acclamations, to the platform of the station, where Mr. Peto, dressed in his uniform of deputy-lieutenant, conducted them to the royal carriage, a magnificent and most elegant equipage, designed by Mr. J. V. Gooch, superintendent of the Eastern Counties, with which his Majesty expressed his particular pleasure, as indeed he did with all the arrangements that had been executed for the ceremony. The royal carriage was occupied by the King and Countess Danner, Mr. Peto, Mr. Anderson, Mr. Bidder, and numerous officers of the household. Upon the party being seated, the train moved slowly from the station, the hearty cheering of the vast concourse combining with the clangour of the military music, and the roar of artillery, to invest the whole scene with the utmost animation and buoyancy, the brilliancy of the weather enhancing its universal enjoyment. On the train arriving at Husum his Majesty was received by the amptman, or president of the district, who delivered an address on the platform. The King and Countess then proceeded in an open carriage to the Castle of Husum; the streets through which the procession passed being profusely decorated with the usual evidences of loyalty, and lined with soldiers. After staying about half an hour at the castle, where resides the president of the district, his Majesty again returned to the train, en route for Tönning, amidst a repetition of the rejoicings already particularised.

So, too, at Tönning, which had put forth its holiday resources so luxuriantly that those who had left it only two days previously hardly knew it again amidst its floreated and banneretted affluence, the decorations of the ships in the harbour forming a most brilliant background to the variegated panorama. None of these vessels, however, could compare to the Cygnus, which Captain Andrews had indeed converted into an argosy worthy the reception of a king. His Majesty, the Countess Danner, the lady of Herr Von Rosen, and two other ladies in waiting on the countess, together with the members of the royal suite, Mr. Peto and his friends including Messrs. Lawrence and Rich, who had accompanied him from England, in all thirty-six persons, for whom only accommodation could be conveniently found on board, were most sumptuously entertained. The viands, fruits, and wines have been brought from the Royal Hotel at Lowestoft by Mr. Howett, who personally superintended their serving. Upwards of sixty of the other officers of the King, the railway officials, civic functionaries, &c., were also regaled at the Victoria Hotel, while the banquet to his Majesty was proceeding, a singular exhibition of political feeling being exhibited in the course of the banquet in consequence of the Prussian consul proposing the health of the King of Prussia; it was received in solemn silence, fresh glasses being called for the next toast, those which had been filled previously remaining untouched during the entertainment. Just previous to this latter event, however, the King, accompanied by his Premier, Count Moltke, descended into the saloon of the Cygnus, and having summoned Mr. Peto, invested that gentleman with the insignia of Knight Commander of the Danebrog—the highest distinction in the power of Danish Royalty to bestow, corresponding in the titular rank and social status with the Garter in England, the order dating nearly a century anterior to that institution—namely, 1219, having been revived in 1693, and reconstituted in 1808—it was one, and the most ancient, of the seventeen orders of foreign knighthood worn by the Duke of Wellington; and, like our own Order of the Bath, is applicable to either military or civil services. The investiture was a premeditated act on the part of the King, who brought with him the chancellor of the order (assisted by the Minister of the Interior) for the express purpose; and in handing over the decoration, his Majesty requested Mr. Peto's acceptance of it, not merely as a memorial of approval from the sovereign in whose reign a great Danish work was executed by a great British capitalist and contractor, but as a souvenir of the King's personal esteem and regard for an estimable, liberal-minded, and accomplished English private gentleman.

During the course of the banquet Mr. Peto proposed the health of his Majesty in the following terms:—“I have the high honour of his Majesty's gracious permission to propose to you a toast, and when I reflect that the railway now opened by his Majesty in person has had his sanction and kind interest from my first proposal of it, and has also, by his Majesty's gracious permission, been called after his own name, you will see that I do right in asking you to drink his Majesty Frederick VII. For myself, and my countrymen here present, and for all, I beg to express to his Majesty our earnest hope that God will bless him, and give him a long life and a happy reign. And I cannot doubt but that a sovereign who has adopted as his motto, “My people's love my strength,” will in that strength reign, and see his country all that he so ardently desires, peaceful, prosperous, and happy. The toast was received with prolonged applause. His Majesty, however, who sat on the right of the chairman, Captain Andrews, and facing Mr. Peto, and having on either side of him the Countess Danner and the lady of Herr Von Rosen, did not make any response, it being contrary to Danish etiquette to do so, either on the part of king or subject. Having bowed his acknowledgments, he proposed “Queen Victoria,” which, it is needless to say, was received with all the honours by the Danish not less warmly than by the English portion of the guests.

Mr. J. Anderson, deputy chairman of the company, in proposing “The health of his Majesty's consort, the Countess Danner,” said he had the honour as one of the representatives of the railway which had conveyed that distinguished assembly in safety from Flensburg to Tönning, to propose a toast which he was sure would be acceptable to his Majesty, and be most cordially received by all around him. The opening of the railway had not only been auspiciously celebrated by his Gracious Majesty in person, but they should ever remember with feelings of satisfaction that its inauguration had been also graced by the presence of his Majesty's consort. It must have been gratifying to the nation to see that she takes a lively interest in undertakings calculated to promote the prosperity of Denmark; and he (Mr. Anderson) hoped that on all future occasions it might be their privilege to associate her name with that of the sovereign of those realms. He had the honour to propose the “Health of his Majesty's consort, the Countess Danner.”

This toast also was received with great applause, as was likewise that of “Mr. Peto,” proposed by the King, who, on rising to depart, said he would follow the good old Danish custom of thanking his host for the noble hospitality the Danish court had experienced at the hands of Captain Andrews; and again wishing Mr. Peto the fullest prosperity, he went on shore, where his appearance was the signal for renewed manifestations of loyalty, which were continued throughout the whole return route to Flensburg. In the evening his Majesty went to the theatre, the principal actress, being a Mme. Brnn, to whom the King gave a bracelet in testimony of his satisfaction with her exertions. The performance, which was witnessed by all the members of the court in attendance on the King, and by the English railway party, whose box adjoined that of his Majesty (right royally emblazoned) lasted about three hours. At its termination his Majesty familiarly addressed a few words to the audience, expressive of his pleasure at his reception in Flensburg, and was cheered to the echo; after which he retired to his hotel.

On Thursday his Majesty entertained, in the Town Hall the principal inhabitants of Flensburg and the district, to gether with the English railway notabilities. The dinner, which was of very English quality, though served more in the French fashion of “removes” than is customary in public in this country, passed off with great satisfaction to all present, the only toasts being two, and both unacknowledged—viz., the King, by the Prime Minister, Count Moltke, and the royal consort, Countess Danner, by the Minister of France. His Majesty then returned to his hotel, from the windows of which he responded to an address read at the head of a procession of 500 torch-bearers (a strikingly beautiful spectacle), and again on behalf of his consort, in whose honour, as well as his own, illuminations were got up, the National Anthem (the counter part of our own air) sung, and admirably sung, by a chorus of 5,000 voices, and a display of fireworks, brought from England and let off on the river. On the Friday he again entertained the Flensburghers at a ball. Mr. Peto, Mr. Bidder, Captain Andrews and party returned in the Cygnus, and arrived at Lowestoft as already stated (after experiencing a heavy gale, in which this beautiful steam-yacht behaved most admirably, a gale in the North Sea, and that a dead noser, being a serious matter for a sharp-nosed steamer of small tonnage), much pleased with the ceremony of opening the “Royal Danish Railway.”

THE ST. PAUL'S ISLAND MYSTERY.

(From the Melbourne Argus, July 1.)

We give below the copy of the log of the barque Eblana, Captain Hall. We had expected that our inquiries would have elicited some further information on the subject, but we have not succeeded; and in publishing the statements we give an opportunity for those to come forward who can, to throw any light on the matter. It is usually understood that the island is uninhabited.

May 17th, 1851.

At 30 min. p.m., on passing the north-east end of St. Paul's Island, every eye watching carefully lest there might be any shipwrecked seamen on it (remembering the sad disaster we read an account of before leaving England, relative to the Amsterdam Island), a fire was suddenly observed to be lighted on the hill as soon as the ship opened the bay, from which volumes of smoke and flame burst forth, causing the greatest excitement on board our vessel, as the thought very naturally struck us that it was a signal of distress, and we all mentally thanked God for his seeming providence in bringing us there as a means of deliverance to those on the island. The steering sails were immediately taken in, the ensign hoisted to gladden the hearts of the supposed sufferers, and the ship's course made towards the island, every preparation being made in the meantime for the reception of the still supposed sufferers. But the feelings of all on board can be better judged than described when, as the vessel approached the island direct for the spot where the signal was made from, every heart beating, every eye straining its nerves in order to discover a living being on some point or rocky eminence, but all in vain. The ship being now within half a mile from our shore, we got our boat out, and sent her with the second officer and two seamen to bring on board all there might be on the island, requesting the second officer to hold our flag on an oar, as a signal, when he landed, if our conjectures were correct. The vessel in the meantime was tacked off and on, keeping as close in shore as was prudent. The boat was observed to pass round a breakwater just distinguishable from the ship, and supposed to have been formed by nature, all eyes still searching the beach and cliffs, anxious to get sight of something human—some wondering, others conjecturing the why and wherefore the signalers themselves were not to be seen. After, however, a longer time had elapsed without the signal from our boat being given as arranged, the excitement on board became truly great, alarm for our men being now the predominant feeling. At length our boat was seen to emerge from behind the breakwater, and in a few minutes was alongside, the officer reporting as follows:—

“That there were four men on the island, who, in the least dreaming that the simple compliment, ‘thank you,’ was due to us as some acknowledgment for our anxiety and trouble for them, at once declined our offer to take them off the island, and land them in Melbourne. And in answer to the inquiries as to what they were doing there, said they had been there six years and a half; that they had been left there by their captain, whose vessel was to have returned in a year, but had not. On being informed of our conjectures relative to themselves when we saw the signal, they, with meaning smile, said, ‘they thought the flames would lead us to think so;’ but pretended the fire was an accident, and declined a repeated offer to take them, assigning as a reason that ‘they still expected their vessel would return, or that their owner would send for them, as they had six-and-a-half-years’ pay to receive.’

“They wanted for nothing. Bread, spirits, and tobacco at times were scarce with them. They had plenty of water and potatoes, and vegetables of every description they had an abundance of,—sending us a sample of potatoes, with an offer to supply us with any quantity of them and a cask or two of water, if we would come on shore for them, taking bread, spirits, or tobacco in exchange. They had four houses, neatly furnished and thatched, with tons of potatoes out of and in the earth; plenty of fish, a seal hanging before the door of one house, a ship's fall-bit and bell at another door, and a flagstaff erected, which of course could only be seen after entering the bay. There were three capstans, a large whale-boat, a ship's long-boat, apparently new, and a small punt. There were eight capstan bars near one capstan, and a small vessel of about 80 tons lying on the beach, which they were breaking up for firewood. They had every comfort in their houses—French beds, chests of drawers, with a magnificent library of books, various guns, but they said they were short of powder and shot. There were only three men to be seen,—one, who talked good English, said the fourth was up at the fire; while another of them, who was talking to one of our men in French (our man being a Jersey man) distinctly said there were only three men on the island, and asked our man many particulars respecting our cargo, the number of our crew, if we had any passengers; and during the conversation, said they had observed a schooner in December off the island, which they set down to be their own vessel, but that a gale of wind came on at night, and the next morning they discovered fragments of a wreck on the east end of the island, which they imagined belonged to their vessel, as they had not seen or heard of her since.

“They showed documents stating that the screw-steamer Nora Creina, and schooner St. Kitts, had both put in there—once for repairs in February last (the steamer), and was supplied with a new rudder, proceeding in fourteen days. The St. Kitts had been supplied with provisions only a week previous.

“These statements may all be correct, as also may be the history these islanders give of themselves; but there is such a discrepancy in the statements of the two men who were in conversation with our second officer and seaman, that, connected as it is with other singular and remarkable circumstances in the whole affair, we are inclined to think them other than such as they wish themselves to appear.

“In the first place, it will be observed, they tell our men they had seen our vessel since daylight in the morning; and although they light this fire (even allowing it to be ‘accidentally’), which spreads in volumes of flames up the hills and over the land with such rapidity as seems to threaten the entire demolition of the island, yet they never once approach a cliff, or any part of the island or beach, to show themselves, which was an easy matter for them to do, and equally easy for us to have seen them, had they done so; but, on the contrary, are only seen and brought out of their houses when our men are actually landed, and following with all their might, ‘House, ahoy!’ when out all three come, smoking their pipes, comfortably apparelled, and with seeming indifference as to whether there was or was not another human being within thousands of miles of them.

“Again, their meaning looks and smiles at each other, when reminded that we had taken the fire so suddenly lighted, as the vessel opened the bay, as a signal of distress, they replying that ‘they thought it would lead us to think so,’ palpably shows that it was in reality lighted as a decoy; for it seemed at such variance with their never allowing themselves to be seen until our men landed. Their apparent apathy previous to the boat reaching the shore, and their expressed desire that we should send on shore again, though it was then approaching sunset, with other various remarkable and singular circumstances, such as a schooner being beached to such a height as (from description) the sea had not done, and three dozen men (much less three or four men) could not do; the capstan and bars apparently in use; the whale-boat (large) which they could very easily have come off to the ship with, and one would naturally suppose they would have been but too glad of an opportunity of doing, if their statements as to the length of time they had been there, &c., were correct; also the punt and ship's long-boat (new), with the breakwaters on each side, made by human hands and art, not by nature, and consequently would require many hands to aid in a work of such magnitude; there being in addition a regular platform made for loading, the flagstaff and bell-rope necessary for all purposes, wood-work newly painted, the beautifully-furnished library of books, quite new in appearance, excellently bound and gilt—the various luxuries which might be supposed at variance with and impossible to obtain under such professed circumstances—all of which lead us to suppose, and almost feel satisfied, there is a communication with the island which no one but those connected and possibly be aware of; leading us further to think there may be a vessel cruising thereabouts, ready to capture small craft, such as our vessel, as there are many similar-sized bound east; and the island appears a capital place as a rendezvous for pirates. If such conjectures are correct, they are certainly worthy of notice; but such, as a matter of course, could not be found out without some steps were taken by Government for the purpose of looking into the affair. While, on the other hand, if the men are really what they represent themselves, it is, in our opinion, none the less worthy of notice; for whatever trouble or expense might be incurred would meet with a sufficient set-off and recompense (as far as shipping is concerned) in the benefits which might be derived through not only giving publicity to it, but also in encouraging the Islanders to a still further cultivation of the land, and enable them to supply vessels in passing with provisions, should they have had a long passage, receiving in exchange such articles as they themselves might require.

“The present produce of the island is, potatoes, cabbages, parsnips, and celery, in abundance. There are, they also said, deer and goats in plenty, with no scarcity of water. Surely, then, these are sufficient inducements for a vessel to call, when she may have been detained through contrary winds, and thereby likely to run short of provisions if she has passengers. As far as we are concerned we had not the slightest knowledge, or even an idea, that the island was inhabited, and we doubt whether it is at all known, unless the captains of the Nora Creina or St. Kitts may have made it public.

“We spoke the brig Grattitude, from Arbroath, Scotland, in 48 deg. east longitude, then 152 days out; and there are frequently such long passages among small vessels. How beneficial to such vessels would a supply at St. Paul's be in the one instance! yet how fearful to contemplate the consequences such a call might be to the Grattitude when she sighted the island, as she intended being, according to Captain Eason's intention, we having spent the day with him on board his vessel, and he in ours, the day as above-named and following day, when we were becalmed!

New Intelligence.

COURT OF CHANCERY, WESTMINSTER, NOVEMBER 2.

Thursday was the first day of Michaelmas Term, and the Lord Chancellor, according to custom, entertained the Judges, Queen's Counsel, &c., at breakfast at his private residence. His Lordship took his seat upon the bench at two o'clock, attended by the Master of the Rolls, the Lords Justices, and the three Vice-Chancellors, and shortly afterwards the several Judges retired to their respective courts.

Police Intelligence.

CLERKENWELL.

SWALLOWING A WATCH.—Jane Jones and Mary Stephens, young women, were charged with having robbed a gentleman of a gold watch.—It was stated that the prisoner Stephens, when in the station-house, swallowed the watch.—Mr. Corrie considered it almost incredible that she had done so.—Inspector Anderson: It is true, your worship; and her life is supposed to be in danger.—Mr. Corrie (to the prisoner): Do you tell any fear?—Prisoner: No, I have nothing to fear; I did not swallow it.—Inspector Anderson: It has been a common habit for persons to swallow shillings, half-crowns, and crown pieces. Some time ago a man swallowed a crown piece, through which he died in the House of Correction. Inflammation having been caused, a post mortem examination took place, and the crown piece was found in his inside.—The gentleman robbed was not in attendance to prosecute the case.—Mr. Corrie remanded the prisoners for a week.

LANBETH.

William Ebbe, an elderly man, was charged with attempting to cut his wife's throat with a razor, and George Ebbe, the son, was charged with assisting the police on the occasion, whilst in the execution of their duty.—The older prisoner is a shoemaker, and his wife, who was evidently labouring under very severe illness, deposed that they had had eighteen children, ten of whom were alive, and dependent on them for support, the youngest being only seven months old. Her husband was a good husband when sober, but at present trade was bad, and he took to drinking at times. She had been ill with fever since Friday week, and the doctor having given her an order for some strengthening food from the workhouse, she asked her husband to go and fetch the same, but he swore at her, and beat her dreadfully, and then went out. She then went and lay down on her son's bed, and her son got underneath to watch that his father did her no injury on his return, for her husband when drunk was like a madman. Her husband soon came back drunk and commenced threatening her, and a neighbour came in and took the baby out of her way. Her husband then took out a razor, and her son rushed from under the bed, and while they were struggling together the police came in. Her husband then said it was his own throat he meant to cut.—Police-constable Callaghan said he told the younger prisoner to let his father go, and he would take him (the father) to the station-house. The son then said, "You shall not do so," and commenced kicking witnesses so violently that he felt the effect of them.—The elder prisoner, in defence, said he was sorry for what had happened, but he had no desire to see his family left from the workhouse, and was vexed that his wife should ask him to go there for food.—The Magistrate said he was not surprised that a woman seeing her children round her wanting food should speak harshly, and as they were situated, she could not do better than apply to the workhouse as she had done. How did the prisoner get drunk if times were so hard with him?—Prisoners: Oh! we can always do that by looking up shopmates who are on the "fiddle."—It appeared from the evidence of a neighbour that the elder prisoner was pretty often seen drunk, and Mr. Norton, in deciding on the case, after a long hearing, said he was disposed, on account of the son having behaved so well in protecting his mother, to let him off.—a course to which the prosecution concurred. The younger prisoner begged that his father might be let off too, but the latter was remanded. The case altogether caused a painful interest in a crowded court.—Mr. Norton acknowledged the receipt of 6s. from C. M. N., and £2 from Mr. S., for the poor box.

SOUTHWARK.

Mary Ann Burke, a decent-looking young woman, was charged with attempting to commit suicide in the Surrey Canal.—William Boyle, ashoe-maker, residing near the canal in the Old Kent-road, said he had known the prisoner some time as a servant near the locality. This morning she came to him in a hurried manner, and said that she had been so ill-used that she was determined to drown herself in the canal. She then left his house, and he followed her towards the canal, and while he was talking to a friend about it, and looking for a constable, he saw her plunge into the water. He immediately ran to the edge and caught hold of her clothes, and with assistance he succeeded in getting her out, without any injury except wetting her clothing.—Mr. A'Becket remanded her until Monday next, to give the officers an opportunity of making some inquiries about her.

NEW MUSIC.

The Arab Mother. By WELLINGTON GUERNSEY.—When You and I were Young. Song. By J. B. ALLEN.—Adieu, dear Home. Ballad. Written by RICHARD BENNETT. Music by E. J. LOUER.—Boosey and Sons.

"The Arab Mother" is a flowing melody in the key of F major. It has been sung by Miss Stabbach with immense applause both in England and Germany, where the latter young lady is on a professional visit. It is within the reach of any moderate voice, and, from its simple and pure style, must become a favourite.

Dr. Allen's ballad, "When You and I were Young," possesses one charm at least, and that is originality. The accompaniment displays a vigorous feeling throughout, quite in keeping with the melody, which is beautiful to a degree.

Mr. E. J. Loder could hardly fail to write a melody worthy of Mr. Bennett's elegant and soft-flowing words. They display a style seldom met with in these days of go-ahead in poetry, as well as every other commodity. The melody, in B flat, possesses every requisite to become one of the most popular songs of the day.

The Comic Zerkel. Edited by HAIN FRISWILL; with Contributions by ROBERT SAUTER, Jun., James Blackwood, Paternoster-row.

This is really a comic almanac, full of spirit and fun, with a joke good, bad, or indifferent, for almost every day in the year. To those who would enjoy a hearty laugh, we can safely recommend this shilling's worth. Scarcely any subject is left untouched, and it is surprising how the authors have contrived to get so much good matter into so necessarily a limited space. The following quotation is from the pages of this amusing little work:—

RESUSCITATION OF THE DRAMA BY MR. CHARLES KEAN.

Zerkel submits the following guide to the next drama at the Princess's:—Mr. Kean will perform all the characters, being at one time his own brother, sister, father, mother, aunt, uncle, and cousins, all of whom he will, in due course, make corpses, as well as of himself, when he will appear as his own ghost, and also the ghosts of his relatives. The action of the play will be supposed to commence five years before it takes place, and all the acts will occur at the same time in different places. In the first act Mr. Kean will appear as his own brother, while he himself is killed a long way off, when he will appear to his brother as his own ghost. Then he will repair to the place where he was before he was his brother, after he was killed, and with there kill the villain who slew him at the time he was his brother. His ghost will then again appear, and with himself, who is very like some one else, who is himself, will attack a mail-coach and four, driven by himself, when he will shoot himself, and immediately appear as somebody else, who will be arrested, and afterwards taken to execution; when somebody else, who is not himself, but who was him before he became another person, will be seized and executed; after which he will himself come home to his friends, who are all enacted by Mr. Kean, and receive their congratulations.

The scene which our artist has rendered with such terrible vitality and such vital terror, exhibits Kean slaying himself after a fearful struggle; the death-scene of the greater villain of the two being troubled by the vision of various ghosts of himself in other characters, the possessor of which ghosts he had, at a period anterior to the opening of the piece, slain; we believe the dialogue to be somewhat of this kind:

Kean No. 1. (With terrible emphasis)—T'so, t'so, t'so, you shall die, eternal ruffian.

Kean No. 2.—Oh do, do, do, do (he should say "no"), your arm is not strong enough to pierce a heart of steel (steel). (They fight.) Kean No. 1 at last knocks No. 2 down, and hovers his sword through him.

Kean No. 2. (With horrible colorations)—Alas! his brazen arm and iron bone, his muscles made of Sheffield steel, have pierced me. Alas! I die. Know, fellow, that my arm cut off thy mother's life, thy father's head, thy fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters (Enter ghosts)—Ha! ha! they re-appear; they're devilish like thee. I go to meet them. (Ghosts horribly and dies.)

Kean No. 1.—An end of one!
Let's see, where am I now? oh! No. Two, I will away, there's business yet to do.

The last scene, wherein every one of the characters appear in Tartarus, and each claim to be the real person, who at the same time is in propria persona paying them a visit, is extremely puzzling. The blue and red fires in the scene surpass everything since Santanapulus; and the audience are so bewilderingly delighted, and delightedly bewildered, that Charles Kean is expected to be made to re-appear before the curtain in all his characters at once.

There is plenty of variety given to the volume by a profusion of illustrations, admirably executed by McConnell, who, in his execution of these works, shows a rapid advancement in his art.

WATER POISONED

BY LEADEN
PIPES.

"The above engraving represents accurately a section of a leaden pipe, which was employed for a short time in conveying water from a well on the grounds of Mr. Dick, of Bournemouth, Isle of Wight. The original section of pipe is 8½ in. long, 2½ in. diameter, and 3-16 in. thick. A great part of the internal surface is corroded by the action of the water; but, as shown in the drawing, four deep excavations have been made, and another is shrouded out of view by the manner in which the section of the pipe has been cut. The water has cut these deep pits almost through the pipe, and not only upon the portion which we have illustrated, but have formed similar chasms throughout the entire length."—Expositor.

"In reply to your letter received this morning, respecting the Gutta Percha Tubing for pump service, I can state, with much satisfaction, it answers perfectly. Many builders and other persons lately examined it, and there is not the least apparent difference since the first laying down, now several years; and I am informed that it is to be adopted generally in the houses that are being erected here."

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—
An Extraordinary Cure of Dropsy, after suffering for eighteen months.

Copy of a Letter from Mr. G. Briggs, Chemist, Goole, dated February 15th, 1853.

TO PROFESSOR HOLLOWAY.

Sir,—I have much pleasure in informing you of a most surprising cure of dropsy, recently effected by your valuable medicines. Captain Jackson, of this place, was afflicted with dropsy for upwards of eighteen months, to such an extent that it caused his body and limbs to be much swollen, and water oozed as it came from his skin, so that a daily change of apparel became necessary. Notwithstanding the various remedies tried, and the difficulties at medical men consulted, all was of no avail, until he commenced using your Pills, by which,
and a strict attention to the printed directions, he was effectually cured, and his health perfectly re-established. If you deem this worthy of publicity, you are at liberty to use it.

I am, Sir, yours respectfully,

(Signed) G. BRIGGS.

THE RUSSIAN ACCOUNT OF OPERATIONS IN THE CRIMEA.

(From the Journal de St. Petersburg.)

The Anglo-French conducted their united forces before Sebastopol from the north of that town to the south, thus entirely changing the basis of operations. They attained this object by a flank march round the town. The organs of the foreign press cannot find expressions to praise sufficiently the skillfulness of this manœuvre. Without wishing to detract from the merit of it, at least it is just to mention also, and to explain the operations of Prince Menschikoff in reference to the enemy.

After the battle upon the Alma, the Prince, not finding a position strong enough upon the Katscha and the Belbek to give a fresh battle to the enemy, passed the Tchernaya, and concentrated his forces in a position to the east of the town, after having garrisoned the forts of the north with a sufficient number of troops.

The enemy advanced, passed the Katscha and the Belbek, and reached the heights which surround the northern forts.

The position of Prince Menschikoff was disadvantageous, inasmuch as it enabled the enemy to occupy the direct communications with the interior of the empire. It was therefore necessary to abandon that position, and the prince achieved the object by a luminous idea, carried into effect in the most daring manner. He marched during the night of the 24th to the 25th of September towards Bakshi-serai, after having crossed the Tchernaya by a single bridge. He executed this march in flank in the course of the night, and in the morning of the 25th found himself in the valley of Bakshi-serai placed in the flank and the rear of the enemy, having his communication free with the interior of the empire, and with the reinforcements which he expected. The new position of the prince would have been annoying to the enemy if the latter had been desirous of attempting an attack against the forts of the north. For this reason the enemy did not make the attempt to attack the forts of the north. On the contrary, he adopted the resolution of changing the point of attack from the north to the south of Sebastopol, by turning the town to the east. Let it be permitted to us here to throw a light upon some circumstances, which will enable an impartial judgment to be formed respecting the operations of the two parties.

Prince Menschikoff had to march across mountains and by one road, which from the point where Mackenzie's farm is situated was only at a distance of four wersts from the advanced posts of the enemy. Indeed, the bivouac fires were seen thence. The prince could not attempt to cover his march by the means which are usually adopted in such cases, for it was necessary, above all things, not to attract the attention of the enemy. In his position it was necessary to avoid a battle, which would have hindered the movements of his column. The prince marched with his train and park of artillery. All these difficulties were surmounted, and our troops had, on the morning of the 25th, reached a point where the enemy did not suppose them to be.

Our adversaries also executed, and almost at the same time, a flank march, but under much more advantageous circumstances. From Belbek, and the plateau which they occupied on the 24th, they had only to gain Mackenzie's Farm in order to attain the route leading by a descent to the Tchernaya. The enemy executed this movement without being perceived by us, for the point where Mackenzie's Farm is situated at a distance of sixteen wersts from the spot where our forces were stationed; and, besides, it is also covered by woody mountains.

If Prince Menschikoff had been desirous of attacking the enemy during the march, he could only have done so by one route, which, for a distance of ten wersts, is upon an ascent from the Belbek to Mackenzie's Farm. It would only have been necessary for the enemy to place a few batteries in a good position upon the heights to enable him to check our attack for so long a time that the movement of the column could not be completed without danger. The enemy had the great advantage of marching without guns and artillery, which, in the meantime, had been quietly transported by sea to Balaklava. Whoever has marched with a troop, whether an army or a battalion, will appreciate the difference between advancing with and without a train of artillery.

It was requisite that Prince Menschikoff should avoid a combat during his movement, because the enemy was placed in an advantageous position for it. Our adversaries, on the contrary, marched in such a manner that they would not have been inconvenienced by an attack upon their flank, an attack which the prince, from the nature of the territory, could not bring about without engaging in it under unfavourable circumstances.

ANOTHER RUSSIAN DESPATCH.

(By Submarine and British Telegraph.)

Bessarabia.

In a despatch, dated Oct. 29, Prince Gortschakoff announces, from his headquarters in Bessarabia, that on the 25th General Liprandi took four English redoubts—outside Sebastopol.

Eleven guns were taken at the same time. Lord Cardigan lost half the light cavalry.

Berlin.

According to a Russian official despatch published in the Kreuz Zeitung, dated St. Petersburg, Oct. 28, the siege of Sebastopol continued uninterrupted, but the fortifications had suffered but little.

The attack on the sea side had not been renewed.

The Russians had made a successful sortie, and a French battery of eleven guns and eight mortars had been destroyed. Lord Clanricarde's son, Lord Dunkellin, had been taken prisoner.

Paris.

The Constitutionnel publishes a long article, accounting for the delay in the fall of Sebastopol, and giving a description of the enormous labour necessarily attendant on such an operation. The following is given by that paper as the weight of the matériel de siège employed by the allies before Sebastopol. The total amounts to 4,521,234 kilogrammes, which is equal to 10,042,750 lbs. avoirdupois. This enormous matériel is divided as follows:—

Cannon	265,590 killog.
Gun-carriages, ammunition, and baggage-wag- gons, &c.	588,176 "
Projectiles	2,510,142 "
Powder	618,600 "

The remainder is composed of a multitude of objects too numerous to be mentioned. But it is to be remarked that in the above enumeration is not included the marine artillery, weighing 3,520 killog. or 3,035 killog. each gun, according to whether they are thirty-six or thirty pounders.

Although Sebastopol is far from being regularly fortified on the land side, the works are numerous, and the cannon of large calibre, and the Russian fleet defends the ramparts. Nearly 1,500 guns are opposed to those of the allies, a number far exceeding the ordinary. Valenciennes, in 1793, sustained a siege of 45 days with 175 cannon; Dantzic, in 1813, had 500 cannon, and yielded through famine at the end of 108 days; Ciudad Rodrigo, with 86 guns, was not taken for 21 days.

A Vienna newspaper, the Ost Deutsche Post, states, upon the authority of letters from Odessa, that a Russian corps of infantry assembled at Perekop on the 15th, and immediately after commenced its march with sixty pieces of artillery for Simferopol by the Steppes, and will there join the forces of Prince Menschikoff. The total force in the Crimea will be as follows:—Garrison of Sebastopol, including the crews of the fleet, 34,000; corps of Prince Menschikoff, 26,000; corps of General Liprandi, 24,000; total, 84,000.

INTELLIGENCE RECEIVED ON THURSDAY, NOV. 2.

(By Submarine and British Telegraph.)

In addition to the intelligence brought to Varna by the Trent steamer, we have received from Vienna a despatch, from a perfectly reliable source, which states that the subjoined statement from the Wiener Zeitung of the English army having experienced a serious reverse is a gross exaggeration.

The affair referred to took place near Enjutoria, where the allies were on the look out for the advancing reinforcements of the Russians.

The British cavalry was attacked, but the French advanced to its assistance, and the Russians retired.

The date is not exactly known, but the affair is supposed to have occurred on the 23rd ult.

The Wiener Zeitung of this evening contains the following doubtful announcement, evidently from a Russian source, which it professes to have received from Kichenoff, in Bessarabia, on the 29th inst.:

"On the 25th, General Liprandi attacked the detached camp of the English, and took the four redoubts which protected their position. The assaults also took eleven guns.

"At the same time such a powerful cavalry attack was made, that it probably cost the English half their light cavalry. Lord Cardigan, who commanded, escaped with difficulty."

The Oesterreichische Correspondenz contains a despatch from Sebastopol of the 24th, which states that nothing decisive had occurred up to that date, but that the bombardment of four of the forts continued, and was answered by the Russians in Sebastopol.

The vessels of the allies were reported to have sustained much injury in their recent attack upon the forts at the mouth of the harbour, and some stores of powder were said to have exploded.

It is certain that the Russians have received considerable reinforcements, though it is by no means so certain that they amount to 30,000 men, the number this despatch fixes them at.

It is also reported that a still stronger corps is expected from Perekop, but this very much requires confirmation.

DESPATCHES RECEIVED IN LONDON ON FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 3RD.

PROSPECTS OF THE SIEGE OF SEBASTOPOL.

(By Submarine and British Telegraph.)

We have received from Vienna a despatch specially forwarded from Constantinople to Senlin, and thence by telegraph. It is as follows:—

"News has been received from Sebastopol of the 23rd, that the cannonade had continued incessantly for seven days.

"The fire of the Russians was said to be slackening, but the French works were not strong enough, and had been much injured.

"The British are said to be within 300 yards of the Russian works.

"A deserter says that the loss of the Russians has been very great.

"Nachinoff is said to be killed.

"A fire broke out in the town on the morning of the 23rd, and was burning when the steamer left."

A second despatch, dated Vienna, Thursday evening, is as follows:—

"Official despatches, dated the 25th of October, for the English, French, and Austrian Governments, which have been received here, show that the siege of Sebastopol is progressing favourably.

"They mention frequent rencontres, but say nothing of Liprandi's alleged victory.

"The French brigade from the Pireus had passed the Bosphorus."

After the very satisfactory intelligence we have given above, and which may be fully relied upon, it is only by way of contrast that we publish the following "official Russian news," received by way of Vienna:—

"On the 25th of October, General Liprandi attacked the allied camp at Balaklava, stormed four redoubts, and took eleven guns.

"The English cavalry was totally beaten, and lost 500 men."

DESPATCHES RECEIVED IN LONDON ON FRIDAY EVENING.

(By Submarine and British Telegraph.)

BALAKLAVA, CRIMEA, Oct. 17.

We opened fire this morning with 71 English and 46 French guns against 130 Russian. At 8.40 a French magazine exploded. At 10.45 the fire was renewed. At 12.45 the French ships engaged the sea forts, with the Agamemnon, the Retribution, and the Britannia. At 1.25 another French magazine blew up. At 1.40 a tremendous explosion took place in Sebastopol. At 2.55 the magazine of the Russian redoubt blew up. The Russians, however, returned to their guns. At 5.30 the ships fired on Fort Constantine at short range. The fire was kept up until 6 o'clock, and did great damage to the Russians.

Balaklava, Oct. 18.

The Russians have re-mounted their guns, which are much heavier than ours.

Our loss yesterday amounted to 96.

The Retribution and London both caught fire, and have had their masts carried away.

The redoubt and the round tower keep up a brisk fire. We get our munitions up with difficulty.

Paris.

The Moniteur of this morning says, that General Canrobert's report of the 23rd states, that the attack continued without any remarkable incident, and that all were full of confidence as to the result. According to further accounts received from Sebastopol to the 25th, some English engineers employed in Sebastopol had made their escape, and reported the town filled with dead left unhurt, and that provisions were becoming very scarce. The upper works of Fort Constantine had been completely destroyed, and two lips of the line sunk.

St. Petersburg.

The St. Petersburg Journal contains two reports from Prince Menschikoff to the Emperor Nicholas, giving details of the operations before Sebastopol on the 17th and 18th. The first asserts that at nightfall on the 17th, the first day of the bombardment, the English had only two guns able to return the Russian fire, while the Russians had a few dismounted.

At noon on the same day fourteen vessels of the allied fleet attacked Sebastopol by sea, directing their fire against Fort Constantine and Battery No. 10.

The shortness of the time and the smoke rendered it impossible for Prince Menschikoff to furnish complete details of the loss on either side; but the Russian cause had sustained a severe loss in the death of Admiral Kornileff, whose leg had been carried off by a round shot, and who died on the spot.

The second report, dated the 18th inst., says that though the allied fire was astonishing by its power and noise, it had not done so much harm as might have been expected.

The Alexander battery, and battery No. 10, had not suffered much, but the Constantine battery had been greatly injured. On the land side, none of the Russian batteries had suffered except No. 3, in which nearly all the pieces (33 in all) had been dismounted.

The Russian loss was estimated at 500 killed and wounded; among the latter Admiral Nachinoff, very slightly.

During the night of the 18th the Russians were busily employed in repairing the damage done to their defences.

On the 18th the English fire was less active than on the day before, and the French had hardly fired at all. Prince Menschikoff attributes this to diversion made without the walls by General Semakine, who appeared in the enemy's rear, and thus diverted their attention from Sebastopol.

The vessels which had taken part in the bombardment on the 17th, and which Prince Menschikoff believed to be all French, had gone away in the direction of Cape Chersonese.

The smoke on the 17th, and a thick fog on the 18th, had rendered it impossible for Prince Menschikoff to state the enemy's loss, but he says it would seem that one ship of the line had been seriously damaged, and two steamers set on fire by red-hot shot.

[Despatches from Lord Raglan have reached France, and may be hourly expected in London.—Ed.]

THE WOUNDED AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

AMONG THE CERTIFICATED NURSES who have just left this country, under the charge of Miss Nightingale, to attend upon the sick and wounded in the British hospital at Scutari, is Miss Erskine, eldest daughter of the Dowager Lady Erskine, of Pwll-y-chochan, North Wales; and among those about to depart on the same mission are two sisters of Mr. C. O. Higgins, one of the members for Mayo.

VERY LARGE AND AMPLE SUPPLIES of winter clothing have been forwarded to the army in the Crimea, and an amusing as well as an instructive library of new books and newspapers has been dispatched to the hospital at Scutari. Already we are gratified to learn that the condition of the sick and wounded at Scutari has materially improved, and many are desirous to join their regiments once more. Accounts from the fleet, too, by the mail which left Balaklava on the 13th, and letters written from several of the ships, all agree in describing the cholera as having almost entirely disappeared from on board the squadron.

THE Scaphandre de Marseilles contains the following account of the departure from that port of the English ladies who are proceeding to the East to attend on the sick and wounded:—"The war in the East has not only exhibited the courage of English and French soldiers, but has also given rise to acts of the most sublime devotion on the part of the weaker sex, who know so well how to fulfil acts of Christian charity. The arrival of fifty-five ladies, who, on the appeal made by the Times, the most powerful organ of the British press, volunteered to proceed to the East to attend on the sick and wounded, has caused a profound sensation in our city. The Times expressed its regret a short time since that the English nation did not follow the example set by our heroic Sisters of Charity. We find that the appeal has not been made in vain. Some years ago a young lady, Miss Nightingale, founded in London an establishment for nurses, and she has undertaken to exercise her Christian charity on a theatre exposed to more danger and under more trying circumstance. From all we could learn of Miss Nightingale and her companions we are convinced that she is equal, if not superior, to this undertaking, to which the English Government has given its support. Miss Nightingale possesses every advantage this world can afford. She is young, rich, and in possession of a fortune of £30,000; she has, nevertheless, devoted herself to an existence of self-denial. Moved by the sufferings of her countrymen in the East, she resolved to follow the sublime example of our Sisters of Charity. With that view she left London to seek a new theatre where she might display her charity and benevolence. The Roman Catholic religion, which has to sustain its ancient reputation for charity, also furnished its honourable contingent of young English ladies. Twelve nuns from the convent at Norwood, under the charge of their superioress, an Irish lady, have also volunteered to accompany Miss Nightingale. Charity alone can effectually smooth down all differences in religion. For a long time past Sisters of Charity, acting under a pious inspiration, have been in the habit of attending the sick and suffering. This is the neutral ground chosen by the Norwood nuns and the companions of Miss Nightingale for emulation. An English priest, the Rev. Mr. Wheble, has already set them the example. This clergyman gave his services wherever they were required, without asking of what persuasion the person was who stood in need of them. At three o'clock to-day these ladies traversed our city to take passage in the Vectis. This vessel, which generally plies between Marseilles and Malta, has been placed at the disposal of these charitable ladies by the Peninsular Company, and is to convey them to Constantinople. The commander, Captain Powell, as well as the crew, received them with every mark of respect. Everyone admired the simple and becoming costume of these women, particularly that of Miss Nightingale, who, from her ladylike manners and appearance, might be taken for a Parisienne. She wore a brown dress, a grey shawl, with a mantle of the same colour, and a black bonnet, altogether in harmony with the Christian mission she has undertaken. The Roman Catholic ladies were habited in their conventual dress—a white robe and black cap."

MEDICAL ORDERLIES FOR TURKEY.—In consequence of a War-office circular received at Chatham on Wednesday, requiring upwards of 400 volunteers to join an ambulance corps for duty at the seat of war in the East, to be under the immediate control of the Medical Inspector-General, to take charge of the sick and wounded soldiers in the Crimea, and during the pending war with Russia, the whole of the depôts, viz., British and East India regiments, comprising the Provisional Battalion, assembled on the general parade-ground of Chatham Barracks, at two p.m., when the war-circular was read to the troops, assembled in open columns of divisions, and sixty men volunteered, all of whom had completed nineteen years' service; there were also upwards of 130 men who had recently returned from India as invalids, but who were found, on medical inspection, to be fit for duty in any other country except India. These troops are to be immediately inspected by the general doctor of the garrison. Every man must have a character for sobriety and good conduct before he can be allowed to pass the commandant. As soon as the number of men are obtained they will be dispatched to Turkey for orders.

LETTERS ABOUT THE ARMY IN THE CRIMEA.

COPY OF A LETTER FROM W. H. FLOYD, 23RD WELSH FUSILIERS (2723).

General Hospital, Scutari, Oct. 14, 1854.

MY DEAR MOTHER.—You may see by my letter that paper is very scarce with me. A letter written by me to my brother will inform you that I have had the honour to serve in the two greatest general engagements ever fought in the world. It will likewise tell you that I have been severely wounded in three places, which is as follows:—A musket shot through the right arm, which I received about an hour after we commenced the action, but being determined to pay them for making a hole through my jacket and fleshy part of my right arm above the elbow, I would not fall to the rear, but made my comrade tie a handkerchief round it, and fought through the action, which lasted three hours after; but just as we thought the action was over, for the imperial Russian army was routed, and we had gained the entrenchments and forts, they halted and wheeled round, and made another stand, which did not last long, for General Sir G. Brown, or Lord Raglan (I do not know which of them) ordered us, the Royal Welsh Fusiliers, Scots Fusilier Guards, Grenadier Guards, and the 33rd Regiment of the Line, to form up for the charge, which we did directly; and now came the grand charge, and away they went after a few moments' wounding with the bayonets, but not before they had left me a bayonet wound in the left thigh and a rifle ball through the left breast, which passed through the breast bone and left lung, going out under my shoulder blade. My other wounds are trifling to compare with the latter, for they are nearly healed up. The wound through my breast is closing up quite fast, but it will be months, the doctors tell me, before it will be healed up inside, and that I will always have to take great care of myself, for any convulsive or quick movement will be dangerous to me. They seem to think it quite a miracle that I should live, for they have agreed that the ball passed between the leading-strings of the heart, and about half an inch from the heart. Yet I am better, and live in hopes to live better a long time, although I shall never have much power in my left arm, nor shall I ever be nighpright; at least I can hardly expect it—but I must hope for the best. I never did despair, nor shall I. I have served my Queen in the best manner I could through an arduous campaign until I became mutilated with wounds; it is now her turn to serve me during the remainder of my days. I shall be home in England in December, and be discharged in May, so you must have a corner berth ready for me. I am getting the best of treatment here. I can get anything I wish; liquors of any description, or food, it matters not what it costs, I am to get it. Give my love to J.— and his wife, Mr. T.—, and Mrs. L.—, Granny, and Uncle Jones. Please tell Joseph that I received his letter with the stamps, but they were no good to me, for I lost them with my pack and kit on the field of battle.

Now for a small anecdote. The bit of hair that you sent me, and another bit that a person you know sent me, I wore in a little bag round my neck. It was shot straight through the middle of the bag, and most of the bag and hair went into my breast, and every morning the doctor takes some of it out. Please answer by return of post. My love to you, all friends, and relations.—I remain, your affectionate youngest son,

HAMLET, Royal Welsh Fusiliers. [1]

I may come home next month, for the Doctor-General just told me he would send me to my native air as soon as possible.

LETTER FROM JOHN HORN, GUNNER IN THE ROYAL HORSE ARTILLERY.

Within gun-shot of Sebastopol, Oct. 6.

DEAR FATHER AND MOTHER.—I have just received your kind and welcome letter, and was glad to hear that you were all well, as this leaves me at present both fat, strong, and hearty. My clothes are getting too small for me. We live a great deal better in Russia than in Turkey. I have a great deal of news to tell you. A few hours after I dispatched my last letter our troop was sent on board, and off we went to the Crimea. We landed about forty miles from Sebastopol without a shot being fired at us; but a number of Cossacks gave us some trouble. Lord Cardigan took two of our guns, with two troops of light cavalry, to give chase to the enemy; I was among them. We pursued them up the country for about eighteen miles, but they kept out of gun reach; night came on, and we were obliged to return to our camps with empty stomachs. Slept very well on the sea sand, with my saddle for my pillow and my cloak for a covering. So much for our first day's work in the Crimea. The French and English were all landed in three days. We then marched up the country, and on the 18th came within sight of the enemy; they, however, kept their distance that day. We slept that night in the same manner as the preceding one. The following morning we proceeded on our route, and came in sight of the enemy, about ten o'clock on the top of a hill. Lord Cardigan with two troops of light cavalry and our troop of Horse Artillery, received orders to reconnoitre. We started up the hill at full gallop; they were on the other side ready to receive us, so a few of our light cavalry were sent out as skirmishers. The enemy also sent out a party of skirmishers, and they fired at each other for about fifteen minutes, when the enemy brought ten guns to bear on our cavalry. Our troop then galloped up, the bullets whistling past our ears, which had a strange effect upon me till we were brought into action; then I had something else to think about. The very first shot I fired sent one of the enemy's gun metals out of its bed. By this time the C troop came to our assistance with a few of the battery's guns, and in a short time we set them all a-flying; but it was a very severe skirmish. Our side lost four horses killed and four men wounded.

The enemy's loss was much greater, about twelve horses and forty-five men killed. So much for the first touch of war. I thought, if they called that a skirmish, what would a battle be?—but I very soon afterwards saw the difference, for, on the morning of the 20th, we marched up to a large range of hills right in front of the enemy. As soon as we were within gunshot—bang—bang—bang went one great gun after another. Shells and balls came whistling just as like lightning. The enemy set a village on fire to smoke a great smoke to blind our army. Our (the Artillery) guns were too light, so there was no way of taking it but by the gun and bayonet. Our gallant infantry marched forward to the charge, and a splendid sight it was to see the Riflemen, the 23rd, 55th, 95th, 88th, 33rd, and the Foot Guards march up to the enemy's batteries and bayonet the "Bears" at their guns. You should have seen our little troop flying, along with the cavalry, up the hill, it would have made you proud of having a son in the Royal Artillery. The enemy flew before us like chaff before the wind. We came into action upon the hill—fired into the valley upon the enemy and sent hundreds unto their long home. We had the shipping on the right of us and they played beautifully upon the enemy. The enemy had a "grand stand" upon the hill for the great people of Russia to see the destruction of our army, but they were finely taken in, for the shipping dropped a shell or two upon it (the grand stand) and sent them flying. The Russians had a great quantity of guns. They expected the fighting to last for five weeks, but we won the day and sent them off in four hours. So closed the great battle of Alma. It was an awful sight to go through the battle-field where thousands were lying dead, many of their bodies being frightfully mutilated. I had to go out at night for water through the thickest of the dead. I stumbled over dead bodies until I felt quite sick. Our army buried all the dead, both of the English and Russians. This work kept us two or three days, and then we marched through a romantic country, but were not again engaged till the 25th. While on the march, our troop, along with the Scots Greys, and other light companies were sent forward to reconnoitre. Our road lay through a level wooded country, where we could not see five yards on either side of us for thick bushes and underwood, and for miles we went along expecting each minute a volley of musketry fired into us. We proceeded till we arrived at a small opening in the wood when we saw a large party of Russian soldiers, and a train of ammunition and goods, and a great many carriages drawn by pretty ponies. We fired upon the soldiers and they took to their heels. We chased them, and they turned and fired into us, but no one was any the worse. We took fifteen prisoners, and a great quantity of ammunition and carriages. We have arrived beside Sebastopol, and are getting the siege trains up to their position. A constant interchange of shots is taking place, but the great siege will commence in a day or two.

7th October, 8 o'clock, a.m.

We have just arrived from another skirmish. The enemy attacked our outposts at five o'clock this morning. Captain G. A. Mande's troop was called out, as usual, to the front, likewise the heavy and light cavalry. We defeated the advanced party with great slaughter. They retired before our shell and round shot as fast as their horses could carry them. One of our heavy dragoons was wounded; that was all the harm we sustained. We may have many such skirmishes before the siege commences, as our people have a great deal of work to do yet. We are lying about five miles from Sebastopol, on the east side of a small harbour, to keep back the enemy in the rear, so that you see we are of some use. This country is much more healthy than Turkey. I forgot to say anything about the French. They fought on our right flank in the battle of Alma. They are a gallant set of men and fought bravely. They pay great respect to our army. I could write all day, but I must leave something to tell you by word of mouth when I come home.

DEATH OF LIEUTENANT LUXMOORE.

Heights above Sebastopol, Oct. 7.

MY DEAR SIR,—I promised in my last letter to give you the full particulars of the death of your son, in the tremendous action fought on the river Alma on the 20th of September. The 30th Regiment was on the extreme right of the whole English force, and next to the French. We advanced in line under a most galling fire, and succeeded in passing a village which the enemy had set on fire to prevent our seeing his position on the heights in front of us. We were crossing a meadow close to the bank of the river Alma when your son (who was in command of the second company from the right of the regiment) fell. He had received a grape-shot on his right temple, which caused instantaneous death. One of our surgeons instantly ran up to him, but he was beyond human aid. At an early hour on the following morning we buried him close to the spot where he fell. The two majors and several officers attended the funeral, and (in the absence of the chaplain) read the funeral service over his grave. His loss we feel much, and I am only expressing the feeling of every officer in the regiment when I say that a more kind-hearted, straightforward man never was in this regiment. Trusting that you will let me know if I can be of the slightest use in any way. Believe me, &c.,

"To the Rev. C. T. C. Luxmoore, Quilsholm, Welshpool."

Crimea, October 12.

DEAR SIR,—Balaklava Bay, where our transports and men-of-war are anchored, is the most beautiful little harbour I ever saw, and almost impossible to find out from the sea. The vessels come in between ridges of rocks, some hundred feet in height, and not room for two ships to go abreast.

I will not now give you any of the details of Alma battle; you must before this have read all the particulars written by able pens than mine; but please God, if I live to go home to old Ireland, I shall be but too happy to tell you all about it. All this country is filled with vineyards of good quality—splendid grapes, too tempting to be resisted; yet I am quite sure they have been the cause of many a death.

We have given the Russians every opportunity of strengthening their positions; they have erected batteries outside Sebastopol, to play upon the land forces; they have sunk eight of their vessels, to prevent our fleet from coming in. All the ladies and gentlemen of the Crimea went into the town, and the governor sent to Lord Raglan to spare the town on account of the females; but his lordship said he was not to be dictated to, but if the ladies chose to come out they might do so, and go where they pleased, and he would protect them. This offer was not accepted, but we afterwards heard that they left the town by night, at the north side. All the dogs of the city have been also turned out, as they are running short of meat and drink.

I was fortunate in being the first to discover some metal pipes which supplies one side of the town with water from a distance of two miles and a half. I reported it to General England, who at once sent a captain of engineers and had it cut off, and while so doing I was nearly taken by the Cossacks, and had to ride very hard indeed for it.

I must now say good bye, but believe me when I say that I shall never forget the great kindness I always experienced in Clonmel, and will trouble you to remember me with the most affectionate regards to my many friends there, and tell them that, amidst all the bustle and turmoil of a camp life, the recollection of many a pleasant hour spent with them comes gratefully back upon my recollection, and cheers me with the hope that we shall meet again in the old country, when I shall give full particulars of scenes I never expected to witness, and in which I had never hoped to be an actor. Yours ever faithfully,

WILLIAM FOSBERRY.

P.S.—Tell * * * * * I often think of him here; such ground for couraging was never seen miles upon miles without a fence. We met several hares on the line of march, and our fellows took and eat a lot of them.

THE COMMISSARIAT IN THE CRIMEA.

The following is an extract of a letter from an old campaigner, dated October 14th, Camp over Sebastopol:—

"I must in fair play give praise to our Commissariat Department, for I never saw a better rationed army in all my life. Not one day have we been without good and wholesome provisions; the pork, twice a week, admirable, and every other day excellent beef or mutton, 1½ lb. each man; tea and sugar daily, and the biscuit remarkably good; indeed, they deserve very great praise, and, though it is the fashion to abuse the commissariat officers, give what they may, still this, I believe, only done by boys, who expect to get turtle-soup and champagne. Few can know better than myself how our army was rationed during the late war; biscuit and the worst description of beef—no tea, no sugar. We now get a double allowance of the finest rum I ever tasted. They are a set of hardworking officers who do not certainly spare themselves; I have known many to be up all night riding in search of provisions. I like to give praise where it is due, and few can give better opinions on these subjects than those who have served in the Peninsular campaigns; for, as I said before, boys who have seen nothing but regimental messes in England can give no opinion on the subject. In every valley there are good cottages and villas; you enter a house with all the accommodation of an English gentleman—pier-glasses twelve and fourteen high, pictures, libraries, Broadwood's grand pianos, all broken to pieces; and this not done by us, but by their own detestable Cossacks."

MISCELLANEOUS ANECDOTES, INCIDENTS, AND MEMORANDA.

ROYAL ARTILLERY CIRCULAR.—The following circular has just been received at the out-stations of the Royal Artillery relative to letters from the seat of war:—"Royal Artillery, Woolwich, Oct. 23, 1854. The wish has been expressed in many quarters that a selection should be made from private letters of officers or non-commissioned officers serving in the army in the field, as can be done at a very small expense, to be printed at the regimental institution, with the initials, or perhaps the name of the writer, and circulated for the information of the regiment. It is thought that details of the greatest interest will thus be placed on record; that many examples, in every rank of the regiment, of gallantry in the field, of devotion to duty, of brave exertions under every difficulty, will thus be presented; and that a body of information of the most valuable description will be placed at the command of those who may hereafter be called upon to serve in the present or future wars. In meeting this wish, and in gratifying the ardent interest which is taken in news from the seat of war by those who not being at head-quarters, have but imperfect means of obtaining information, it will be necessary to exercise due judgment not to violate private confidence, nor circulate matter reflecting direct or indirectly on individuals, and to exclude expressions or sentiments never intended for publicity. With these restrictions it appears not improper or difficult to meet the wishes thus expressed, and the friends or correspondents of officers or non-commissioned officers and men in the East who may hold in their possession letters of interest are invited to communicate them, or such portion of them as they may think fit, to the secretary of the Regimental Institution. Should a collection of sufficient interest and value thus be formed, it will be submitted to the committee to sanction its appearance, and, if printed, care will be taken to place it within the reach of all ranks.—J. H. LEFROY, Captain, R.A., Secretary."—[The plan is abandoned.—Ed.]

ADMIRAL KORNILOFF, who has just fallen at Sebastopol, was one of the officers who accompanied Prince Menshikoff on his mission to Constantinople in March 1853.

ON THE NIGHT OF THE 7TH OCT. a rather serious mistake happened on the part of the Rifles. Sir George Brown had been out visiting his advanced pickets in front of the enemy after dark. He had proceeded a little to his front, and was returning by another route into the lines, accompanied by his aide-de-camp. The Rifles on duty at this point not imagining it could be the general, opened fire, but luckily did Sir George no injury, although his aide-de-camp had a hall pass through his coat. This is the second time the Rifles have fired without knowing at what mark. This is unfortunate; but, in absurdity, does not come up to the blunder of a regiment of Highlanders, a detachment of whom, on outpost duty the same night, commenced firing sharply on an old cow, and aroused the whole camp in that direction.

THE "JOURNAL DU LOIRET" gives some particulars of the capture of Prince Menshikoff's carriage. A Russian general was seated in it when the Zouaves were approaching, and from some unexplained cause, as he must have seen that all resistance was useless, he fired a pistol at them, and killed one of the French. They retorted by a general discharge, and the Russian general had both his cheeks transversed by a ball. He had not died of the wound. The carriage, which turned out to be the very one which Prince Menshikoff had used in his embassy to Constantinople, has now again seen that city.

WE HAVE BEFORE US (says the Constitutionnel) letters from the Crimea to the 13th October, which confirm what the English journals relate on the dearth of every kind of provisions or other objects which contribute to the comfort of the soldier. Sugar was sold at 2½ 50c. the pound, the most ordinary wine 3fr. a bottle, tobacco 10fr. the pound. Thus the soldier is obliged to content himself almost exclusively with his rations.

A MEDAL HAS ALREADY BEEN STRUCK in honour of the battle of Alma. On one side it has the portrait of the Emperor, and on the other the following inscription:—"Victoire d'Alma, remportée sur les Russes par les Armes Alliées de France, d'Angleterre, et de Turquie, Sept. 20, 1854." It is the composition of M. Borrel.

MR. WILKINSON, OF ORANTHAM—, has received a letter from his son, a seaman on board the Trafalgar in the Black Sea fleet. The letter is dated from Kalamita Bay, and a postscript, dated Sunday, Oct. 1, shows what courageous stuff our Jack Tars are made of: "I am now going on shore with 139 of my messmates. We are to form a storming party before the walls of Sebastopol; so, if I am popped off, Taylor will write to you."

TILL ARRIVAL AT BALAKLAVA officers and men, both alike, had nothing from the place of disembarkation but what they could carry themselves. Of course, says a correspondent, beards have grown, skins have become brown if not black, clothes have become shabby, rugged, and dirty; shakos have either been lost in battle or on the march; belts are not looking clean. In short, we are as shabby a lot to look at as you ever saw or could conceive. However, we mean to get into Sebastopol, and then we shall put ourselves to rights. A complete new equipment of everything will be necessary for the winter—where that is to be passed no one seems to know, but we had a foretaste of what winter might be here two days ago. There is no firewood, either, to be had. Cooking is therefore difficult, and tire for warmth out of the question.

TWO SPIES HAVE JUST BEEN SENT US FROM BALAKLAVA. What they propose doing with them I know not. The master caulker of Sebastopol dockyard is an Englishman; he allowed himself to be taken prisoner a few days since, and I hear to-night he has made his escape, of course, taking into the town every information. I ask, is not this fellow worthy of death?

THE FOLLOWING ARE THE DISTANCES which separate the points so frequently mentioned in the recital of events connected with the present war: From Marseilles to Malta, 1,000 kilometres (a kilometre is five-eighths of an English mile); from Malta to Constantinople, 300; Toulon to Constantinople, 1,680; Constantinople to Varna, 160; from Constantinople to Euxatoria, 180; from the Isle of Serpents to Cape Tarkan, on the west of the Crimea, 200; Odessa to Sebastopol, 534; Varna to Sebastopol, 360. By land from Euxatoria to Old Fort the distance is 24 kilometres; from Old Fort to the village of Alma, 36; from Alma to Belbek, 10; from Belbek to Sebastopol, 10; and from Balaklava to Sebastopol, 12.

ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND PAIRS OF WOODEN SHOES, and the same number of wooden socks, are about to be sent from Lyons to the army in the East, in order to protect the feet of the soldiers against damp and cold during the winter.

ONE SHELL BURST near a tent belonging to the 68th without injuring any one. Two men of the 63rd met with one of those miraculous escapes which, however authentic, always read fabulous. A round-shot, a 48-pounder, passed so close to the head of one of these men that the chin-strap of his cap, tied above the head, was torn by the wind of the ball, which passed on and smashed the firelock of the other man, which he was then occupied in cleaning. Neither was injured in the least.

YOU KNOW WHAT IS CALLED "FIELD DAY" at the hospitals in town. Perhaps an amputation or two, with half a dozen surgeons to assist if necessary, and a hundred surgical eyes looking on. Can you imagine our field day on the banks of the little river Alma? If God spares us again to see old England, I shall probably never more witness as much practice in my whole lifetime as I saw there in two hours. The pluck of a soldier no one will have yet truly described. They laugh at pain and will scarcely submit to die. It is perfectly marvellous, this triumph of mind over body. If a limb were torn off or crushed at home, you would have them brought in fainting, and in a state of dreadful collapse. Here they come with a dangling arm or a riddled elbow, and it's "now doctor, be quick if you please. I'm not done for so bad but I can get away back and see!" And many of these brave fellows, with a lump of tow wrung out in cold water wrapped round their stumps, crawled to the rear of the fight, and, with shells bursting round them and balls tearing up the sods at their feet, watched the progress of the battle. I tell you as a solemn truth that I took off the foot of an officer, Captain —, who insisted on being helped on his horse again, and declared that he could fight now that his "foot was dressed." Surgeon — told him that if he mounted he would burst the ligatures and die on the spot, but for all that he would have returned to the hill if he could have prevailed on anybody to help him to mount.

AT SEBASTOPOL at night the working parties march out to the trenches, and, as a matter of course, the Russians open their fire. In one of the trenches a little panic was created. Shells and rockets were pouring around in all directions, save the right one, when, from among the sailors employed at the works, a voice exclaimed, "Jack, it's getting too warm by half; I'll hook it." In accordance with this expressed determination, the speaker retired, or, to use his own phraseology, he "hooked it." A few others followed, and in some few minutes not a blue-jacket was on the ground. The panic spread amongst the workmen, who also "hooked it." Order was, however, soon re-established, and everybody returned to the work. Whilst the men were joking at the occurrence, in one of the works, a shell suddenly fell right amongst them. In an instant everybody was flat on his belly; in some parts three or four living beings were piled upon one another, and all were shouting out, "Shove it out, shove it out!" A young Rifleman had the pluck to take the shell in his hands, and rolled it over the parapet. Something had gone wrong with the fusee, for the shell did not burst; but of this, the man who courageously took it up in his arms was not aware, and his conduct merits reward.

SIR C. CAMPBELL—A report has been prevalent of the death by cholera, in the Crimea, of Sir Colin Campbell ("Feather Bonnet").—The rumour is unfounded. It probably originated in the fact, that another officer of the same name, Captain Colin Campbell, had fallen a victim to the disease.

AT CONSTANTINOPLE the wounded are represented as rapidly recovering. On the 11th, 500 English and French soldiers were declared to have recovered from the wounds which they had received at the battle of the Alma, and had taken their departure for the Crimea. Mr Levy and three other surgeons, accompanied by forty assistant-surgeons, were to embark on the 15th for Sebastopol, to establish there a large hospital as soon as the town was taken.

IN A HOUSE near to our position at Sebastopol, lives an Englishman, who, according to his own account, has been for the last twenty-five years employed in public works there. His name is Willis. He states that he has been ill-used by the Russian authorities, who, though he had fulfilled his time of service, refused to give him a pension, but discharged him with a bonus of only one year's pay. He says that part of the retreating army from Alma passed by his house, and destroyed much of his property. He is advanced in years, appears to be deaf, and has a son in the Russian army. He states that he was in Sebastopol a few days since for provisions; that they wished to detain him as a prisoner, but that he was released on condition that he did not attempt to come in again. He asserts, that if we were to make an attack upon the city, we should carry it by assault in four or five hours. Circumstances have led to a suspicion that much of Mr. Willis's deafness has been assumed; and it is so extraordinary that the Russian authorities should have permitted an Englishman so well acquainted with Sebastopol to remain outside its walls, that a doubt is thrown over every statement he makes.

COLONEL UPTON has afforded valuable information touching the fortifications of Sebastopol, and no doubt is entertained that the fortress must fall very shortly.

CAPTAIN CAMERON, Grenadier Guards; Lieutenant W. Knollys, Scots Fusilier Guards; Capt. Connolly, 30th Regiment; Capt. Raines, 95th Regiment; and Lieutenant S. R. Chapman, 20th Regiment, have volunteered to act as engineers, and their services have been accepted by Sir Jobu Burgoyne.

A correspondent announces one lamentable fact—that out of 3,003 effective bayonets in the Guards brigade on the 20th of July, only 1,740 are now available. And out of nearly forty officers then attached to each battalion, only fourteen remain on the effective list.

THE CRIMEA AND THE 23RD REGIMENT.—Thirty centuries since the Crimea was the hunting-ground of the Cimmerioi, a people who, on the invasion of their country by the Scythians, fought a desperate battle among themselves on the question of resistance or non-resistance; and then, having very probably become hors de combat, abandoned the land to the invaders. This circumstance in itself seems sufficient to identify the Cimmerioi with the Celts, whose valour was so often and so fatally expended on internal quarrels. This was ever the great error of the Cymry, or Welsh, who thus appear to be oneinamo and manners with the ancient Cimmerioi. The traditions of the Cymry point to the Gwlad yr Haf (Summer Land), or the Crimea, as their original home, and that they emigrated under their leader Hu Gadarn, seeking a land where they could dwell in peace. This evidently alludes to the Gwlad yr Haf having become the scene of war and bloodshed; and their wanderings are stated to have continued until their arrival in the island of Britain. After the revolutions of ages a mighty expedition has sailed from Britain and landed in the Crimea; and in that expedition some of the descendants of the Cimmerioi have returned to their mam-ylad (mother-land), where many of them, with that "heroic gallantry" which has conquered on numberless fields of fame, have fought and died, and been covered with earth among the barrows of their "old fathers."—From Notes and Queries.

NARROW ESCAPES.—The escapes was truly miraculous. One man had a grapeshot lodged in his pouch, in the very centre of his ammunition; another in his great-coat. My orderly sergeant was struck by three balls; my friend Loder got a ball through his shirt, and another through his trousers. The colonel's horse was shot. We had three officers wounded; one (Woolcombe) very severely—he has, poor fellow, lost his leg, and we hear it has to be taken off again higher up.

RUSSIAN IMPERIAL GUARDS.—It may not be irrelevant to remark here that a great error has been committed in the reports of individuals (French and English) writing from the Alma relative to the presence of the troops of the Imperial Guard. Not a man of that corps was or is in the Crimea. It is possible that two or three regiments of the reserve of the grenadier corps may be in the Crimea; but the troops that took part in the battle, as the numbers on their accoutrements testify, belonged to the 16th and 17th divisions (6th corps), line and light, and to the reserves of the 4th and 5th corps, with some battalions of reserve grenadiers. Unlike our own Guards, who are always foremost in the fray, and never held back or unused on service, the Russian Guard is invariably nursed, husbanded, and kept from harm's way until all other troops are beaten or exhausted. They are reserved for grand coups, under an impression that if they were employed as other troops are, worked and beaten, the result would be demoralising to the whole army, and detrimental abroad. It is to be regretted they were not at the Alma. They would have shared the same fate as the rest.

DEATH OF THE REV. GEORGE MOCKLER.—The following communication has been received by the brother of the late Rev. George Mockler:—"War-office, Oct. 25. Rev. and dear Sir,—Your excellent brother fell a sacrifice to his zeal, and sank under the heavy labour which was unavoidably imposed upon him. He landed in the Crimea, like the rest of the officers, without tent or baggage of any kind, except what he could carry. He struggled on nobly against failing health, and officiated to the last; he was meecing in his attentions to the sick and wounded, but his constitution could not bear up against many days and nights of exposure, and he died on the 2nd of October, absolutely from exhaustion. The highest testimony is borne to his character and conduct by all who knew him; and it must be the consolation of yourself and the rest of his relations that, if ever martyrdom was endured where death of violence did not consummate the work, your poor brother suffered it. He will find his reward elsewhere. He was buried on the heights of Sebastopol. With sincere commiseration for the sorrow which you are now enduring, believe me very faithfully, yours.—G. R. GLEND.

THE PATRIOTIC FUND.

GRAND MILITARY FETE AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

Never since the opening of the Crystal Palace has so great a crowd been seen in its interior and gardens as that which on Saturday, Oct. 28, thronged both to attend the great military fete in aid of the funds for the relief of the sick and wounded, and the widows and orphans of her Majesty's forces engaged in the war. No sooner had the advertisement announcing the Patriotic Fund been published, than the directors of the Crystal Palace announced their intention of bringing the vast machinery at their command to bear for the increase of the fund, by devoting one day's receipts—literally "a day's pay"—of their immense capital and plant, to that object. Although the down trains commenced running very early, the visitors continued to pour in until after the termination of the concert, and subsequently, when the tide began to turn, every train was filled in a moment, as if by magic, and a queue filling the whole length of the entrance corridor and running far into the building, remained until a very late hour in the night. A bright October day poured down an unusual amount of sunshine upon the crowd, as if Providence were determined that nothing should be wanting to give éclat to this great demonstration. The presence of a great sentiment was perceptibly universal, and gave to the occasion a character of importance far beyond anything that could be imagined of an ordinary fete-day, however brilliant and attractive.

All the military bands within available distance were permitted by the proper authorities to give their assistance to the fete; and a most attractive addition was contributed by the Emperor of the French in sending over his matchless band of the Guides to blend their strains with the performance of our own military musicians. These gentlemen—for gentlemen they emphatically were in appearance, deportment, and the evidently high style of their professional education—were the veritable lions of the day, as from the moment of their arrival to their departure they were followed by immense crowds, fraternised with in every possible way, and cheered on leaving the building in a manner which would have brought tears into the eyes of the Czar could he possibly have had an opportunity of contrasting the demonstration with his own reception in this country some years since. The musical force, which could not have amounted to less than seven or eight hundred performers, consisted of the following hands:—First and Second Life Guards, conductors Mr. Wardell and Mr. Grattan Cooke; the Blues, Mr. Tuttau; Carabiniers, Mr. Cucuin; Grenadier Guards, Mr. Schott; Coldstreams, Mr. Godfrey; Scots Fusilier Guards, Mr. Boose; 15th (Royal Irish), Mr. Kettle; 94th Regiment, Mr. Froehert; Royal Artillery, Mr. Smyth; Sappers and Miners, Mr. Youle; Royal Marines (Woolwich and Chatham), Messrs. Winterbottom and Rogers; Artillery Company, Mr. Smithies; Crystal Palace Band, Mr. Schallahn; and, lastly, the band of the Guides, conducted by M. Mohr. The whole of this harmonious cohort mustered at the London-bridge Station at seven o'clock in the morning, and were escorted by Mr. Deane of the Crystal Palace Company to Sydenham. It is hardly necessary to add that they were hospitably received on their arrival, the Guides being provided with their national déjeuner à la fourchette in a separate apartment. Even at the early hour before mentioned, a considerable crowd surrounded the railway-station, who cheered lustily for the musical volunteers, and from that time down till about midnight the railway officials had such a day's work as must have thrown all their experience of Epsom days, Crystal Palace openings, and other great occasions, completely in the shade. Never was money poured forth with greater cheerfulness and alacrity, and, as a general rule, the ticket-holders present refrained from making use of their privilege. Hundreds had bought tickets previously, and for these a separate entrance was provided, but, as the exit to the platform was one and the same, their forethought procured them little or no advantage. However, considering the extraordinary pressure, the circulation was on the whole well managed.

On entering the building itself the scene was striking in the extreme. The place filled with company, strains of military music saluted the ear in every direction, and an unusual degree of life and excitement was everywhere perceptible. The immediate object of the fete was indicated by the presence of an immense trophy standing in the centre of the great transept, and consisting in some part of the spoils of war. At the base lay the guns taken at Bomarsund, and higher up a Russian helmet was conspicuous. These two objects were looked at with great interest by those who were acquainted with their history; but it is to be hoped that before long we shall have them in greater profusion for occasions like the fete. The rest of the ornaments consisted of muskets and small arms tastefully arranged, rows of cannon balls, and, as a reminiscence of the old wars, some complete suits of steel armour. Bayonets gleamed harmlessly in fanciful patterns, and the formidable Minié rifle was not forgotten. Drums, shields, and the other elements in the "Pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war," completed the design, which was paré with the colours of the three allied nations. The whole looked extremely striking and handsome. This trophy was the whole of the extra decoration that had been attempted, but any ornamental deficiencies were amply made up for by the numbers and brilliancy of the company, the fineness of the day, and the vast and noble proportions of the building itself, which seemed now at last to have found out its legitimate function—that of accommodating fets of the first magnitude. Among the crowd foreigners were plentifully sprinkled, the tall forms and brilliant cuirasses of the household troops were everywhere conspicuous, and the drum-majors of the various regiments formed no unimportant feature in the grand tableau. On our entrance we found the vast concourse of visitors labouring under the perplexities of an embarras de richesse in the musical line. The bands had been stationed in various parts of the building, and appeared to be all playing simultaneously as to time, but at the same time to exercise an entire independence of selection. The solemn strains of a slow march came from one quarter, the exhilarating polka from another, while the people rushed to and fro after the sounds, which attracted them on their entrance; but no sooner had they attained the locality of one band, than they were called off by some new burst of harmony in another. However, all uncertainty of movement settled down at about one o'clock into an universal and steady rush towards the refreshment department, where Mr. Horne was valiantly sustaining a succession of assaults. At the first onslaught all the buns disappeared, accompanied by a tremendous volley of ginger-beer corks, then the great coffee-machine was drained in a trice, and the serious business of bombardment began on the cold fowl and tongue, the charter dish of the establishment. It was a complete saturnalia of knife and fork, and soon produced its natural result, a famine in the land. The stores of the Sydenham larder are known to be ample, but what accumulation of victuals could withstand the assault of between fifty and sixty thousand vigorous Britons, animated by country air, exercise, and patriotism, and with their digestion strengthened by the consciousness that they were assisting in a noble work? For those, who were fashionable enough to defer dining until a more fashionable hour, this consciousness was their principal consolation, as all they had of a more material character to comfort them was the debris left by their more vigilant predecessors. The necessities of the case led to all the vicissitudes of the bivouac. Fashionable looking men might be seen furtively demolishing some bread and cheese which they had secured by unheard-of exertion, with their plate resting on the bank of a llama of Tibet. Others picnied among the aborigines of the Pacific, and a still greater number munched as they walked whatever they had been able to obtain at the hardly-pressed commissariat. Still, all was good-humour, and a general conviction was expressed, that wonders had been done in providing substantial entertainment for so vast a number of visitors. The Guides, who up to the time of their performance, wandered through the building, seemed at once pleased and astonished at everything they saw, and had full occupation in bowing for the continuous cheering, and shaking hands with every one who could get near enough for the performance of this English form of salutation. Ultimately they took their places in the transept close to the trophy, and were immediately surrounded by enthusiastic admirers on chairs, who in closely packed ranks, three or four deep all round, magnanimously excluded the gaze of the outer barbarians. Having contrived to get a peep between the legs of the polite individuals who had made the privilege of staring at our guests a close monopoly, we were able to see that the band, fifty-six in number, were clad in scarlet, profusely decorated with orange lace, the form and cut of the uniforms being something like the Hon. Company's artillery. No extraordinary expense had been lavished on the ornaments, which were less costly than those of many of our own regimental bands, but the features of the men were highly intellectual, and their whole deportment graceful and gentlemanly. The conductor, Mr. Mohr, wielded his magic baton effectively, but without any of that extravagant action which we had been taught to believe was the peculiarity of the French school, and bowed frequently in return for the well-earned plaudits of his audience.

About half-past three the whole of the bands assembled on the terrace, and performed a selection of music. This terminated the pleasures of the day, and immediately after began the evening's perplexities. The immense crowd seemed suddenly and irresistibly struck with a conviction that they would collectively be too late for the train. The staircases became blocked up with people descending from the galleries, and the wide pathways in the gardens, and we fear we must add many of the tasteful parterres were black with people all running in one direction. The nave was equally crowded, but all moving towards the station. Soon, however, everything came to a standstill. The long narrow corridor was blocked up in a moment, and the stream of people within the building was thrown back, but was in part consoled by the opportunity afforded of seeing the palace by moonlight, certainly one of its most attractive aspects. The Crystal Palace Company prudently had taken the precaution of erecting strong barriers across the lower end of the corridor, which although they caused some delay were invaluable in the prevention of accidents. Had the crowd been permitted to rush continuously to the interminable flights of stairs, there is little doubt but that many of the weaker visitors would have been trampled to death. As it was, some few ladies fainted, but the consideration with which they were treated spoke eloquently for the good feeling of the people. The rate of progress through this narrow passage may be estimated from the fact that those who entered it at six o'clock did not land at London-bridge station until half past eight, and it was several hours later before the building was entirely cleared out.

THE MUSIC.—There were the seven bands of the different regiments of Guards, those of the 18th (Royal Irish) Regiment, of the 94th, of the Royal Artillery, of the Royal Sappers and Miners, of the Royal Marines at Woolwich and Chatham, of the Hon. Artillery Company, of the Crystal Palace Company, and of the French Imperial Regiment "Les Guides," the Private Band of the Emperor. There were also the juvenile bands of the Royal Military Asylum at Chelsea and of the Royal Naval School at Greenwich—a truly monster assemblage of martial musicians. In the earlier part of the day, the bands according to the programme, were stationed within the building; the French band of the Guides, the "observed of all observers," were properly placed in a prominent position, on a raised platform in the central transept, and the other bands were located around, and necessarily (from the limited space) so near each other, that any one of them could be heard by the dense crowd who filled the place. This rendered an arrangement for their playing alternatively, and in regular order, absolutely necessary. But there was nothing of the kind, no "series of selected pieces," each band played when it pleased and what it pleased; and two hands sometimes struck up at the same time producing a "charivari" much more strange than agreeable. Among the others, the band of the Guides played from time to time. This celebrated band consists entirely of Frenchmen, trained by their director, M. Mohr, a most accomplished musician. Almost all of them are young men, well-looking and gentleman-like; their uniform is exceedingly handsome and becoming, but not remarkable for splendour. The composition of the band differs considerably from that of our military bands: the following note of its component parts, with which one of its members politely furnished us, will enable readers conversant with military music to make the comparison: 8 clarionettes, 1 petite clarionette, 2 hautbois, 2 flutes, 4 cornets-à-piston, 3 huyles en si bémol (B flat), 3 saxophones, 2 sax trombas, 2 barytones, 2 cors d'harmonie (French horns), 3 trompettes, 2-cylindre, 4 trombones, 5 basses en si bémol, 3 contrebasses en si bémol (E flat), 1 contrebasse en si bémol, timbales (kettle drums)—forty-six in all—a strength quite sufficient for any military band. The brass instruments are of the kind recently invented by M. Sax, a family of instruments much more generally used in France and Germany than as yet in England; our countrymen in this as in other respects being slow to adopt anything "new-fangled," whatever may be its merits. The Old Hundredth Psalm, inserted in the programme, was not attempted.

SOLDIERS' WIVES AND FAMILIES.

[THE PATRIOTIC FUND.]

To the Editor.

SIR,—The question proposed to us as to the right of participation on the part of the widows and orphans of officers in the Patriotic Fund is rather one for the decision of the Royal Commissioners than for answer by ourselves as the secretaries to the Royal Commission.

Upon mere technical construction it would appear that the Commission does not limit its bounty and operation to the widows and orphans of private soldiers and seamen, although it is quite evident that the first objects of the Commission are to provide for those for whom no provision has hitherto been made on the part of the Government; but such is not entirely the case with the widows and orphans of officers, who, under certain circumstances, do derive benefit from pension regulations.

However, we consider ourselves at perfect liberty to say that if subscriptions or donations come to us, or to the funds of the Royal Commission, charged with any stipulations or limitations for the benefit of the widows and orphans of officers, there can be no doubt that the wishes of the donors will be strictly complied with, as there is nothing enjoined by the Commission itself (as we apprehend) which can prevent the Royal Commissioners taking charge of and applying such contributions according to the intentions of the donors. We have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servants, E. GARDINER FISHBOURNE, Captain, R.N.

J. H. LEPROY, Captain, R.A.
Hon. Secretaries, Royal Commission of the Patriotic Fund.

OUR FRENCH ALLIES.

NAPOLÉON III. AND "TIMID COUNSELS."—The following important paragraph occupies the chief place in Tuesday's Moniteur:—"Certain words in the Emperor's letter to the widow of Marshal St. Arnaud—résistant à de timides avis—have been the text of false interpretations. Their only aim was to exhibit more distinctly the energy of Marshal St. Arnaud in opposing the natural differences of opinion which manifested themselves in the councils of the French army and navy on the eve of so serious a resolution." The Emperor has authorised Prince Napoleon to wear the military medal, as a reward for his conduct at the battle of Alma.

"THE COMING ARMAGEDDON."—It is said that by the month of March France will have 600,000 bayonets in the field, and by the month of June, unless peace be proclaimed, an army numbering 800,000.

CRIMEA.—We read in the Constitutionnel:—"The Duke de Clermont-Tonnerre, whose son was orderly officer to Marshal de St. Arnaud, received from the Marshal one of the last letters he ever wrote. 'It was the day after the battle of the Alma,' says the Moniteur de l'Oise, 'that the Marshal wrote to M. de Clermont-Tonnerre, to the effect that in the midst of the balls the young captain had shown a coolness worthy of his great name, and that he (the Marshal) was perfectly satisfied with his conduct.' Count Aynard, de Clermont-Tonnerre, thus alluded to, came back to France in the Berthollet, ill of fever, but he is now recovering."

SAILING OF TROOPS.

THE QUEEN OF THE SOUTH. Captain Sharp, under the direction of the mail agent, Lieut. Griffiths, which left Portsmouth on Friday week, met with very heavy weather during the night when outside the back of the island. The wind came dead against them, and at three on Saturday morning it blew a gale. To alleviate the sufferings of the unfortunate soldiers, not one of whom had ever been on board ship before, the commander put into Portland, where the advantage of the breakwater was apparent, for they were in smooth water. Here the gulland red coats speedily recovered, and all lent a hand to clean out the barrack room. Their sufferings were very great, owing to the gale, which prevented the side scuttles being open—the poor fellows bore up patiently against it. The next morning put a new face on matters, and she proceeded on her voyage with a fine breeze from the N.E.

DISPATCH OF TROOPS FOR THE EAST.—Colonel Scott is expected here from Manchester for the purpose of inspecting the steamers Ottawa and Cleopatra, belonging to the Canadian Steam Navigation Company, which have been fitted up by Mr. John Laird, of Birkenhead, for the conveyance of troops to the seat of war in the East. The Cleopatra will take out about 650 troops, besides officers; and the Ottawa will have accommodation for 550 men, in addition to officers. Both steamers have been fitted up in a very superior manner, affording accommodation that will ensure both comfort and health to the troops on the voyage.—Liverpool Mercury.

DUBLIN.—The Evening Post contains the following announcement of more troops to the East:—"The following drafts have received orders for immediate embarkment at Queenstown, per Cleopatra, for the East:—21st Regiment, 122 men; 30th, 52 men; 33rd, 62 men; 47th, 61 men; 50th, 102 men; 55th, 133 men; and 68th, 41 men. They are to proceed from the dépôt battalions at Birr, Templemore, and Fermoy respectively." The following are the numbers, and the names of the officers, who embarked at Queenstown on board the Jura for the Crimea:—5th Dragoon Guards—Captain R. Thompson, 1 private soldier, 3 horses. 8th Hussars—Captain Lord Killeen, 1 private soldier, 3 horses. 30th Foot—Ensign S. Gubbins, 2 sergeants, 100 rank and file. 33rd Foot—Ensign J. Rogers, 2 sergeants, 100 rank and file. 41st Foot—Ensigns J. A. Hamilton, G. Peddie, F. Kingscote, C. V. Fitzroy, H. S. Hill, and E. L. B. Lowry; 2 sergeants, 100 rank and file. 47th Foot—Ensign A. H. White, 1 sergeant, 100 rank and file. 49th Foot—Ensigns C. Fitzgerald, G. K. Chatfield, and W. Young; 3 sergeants, 130 rank and file. 50th Foot—Ensigns W. W. Bond, F. L. Barwell, and R. H. P. Doran; 2 sergeants, 100 rank and file. 55th Foot—Ensigns W. B. Johnson and J. W. Trevor, 2 sergeants, 160 rank and file. 57th Foot—Captains Jason, Hassard, and P. H. Lea, Lieutenant A. L. Copland, Ensigns G. Mitchell, W. A. J. Short, A. F. A. Slade; Assistant-Surgeon J. S. Phelps, 4 sergeants, 240 rank and file. 63rd Foot—Captain G. W. Macquarie, Ensign G. P. Beamish, 1 sergeant, 70 rank and file. 68th Foot—Ensigns E. R. F. Vickers and E. Deshon, 1 sergeant, 70 rank and file. In all about 1,200 sergeants, drummers, rank and file, exclusive of officers. The undernamed medical officers have also proceeded in the Jura, viz.:—Assistant-Surgeons C. J. White, 3rd D. Guards; T. Tevian, 3rd Foot; J. C. Ovens, 9th Foot; W. Hanbury, 13th Foot; W. Kenwick, 14th Foot; S. M. Webb, M.D. 36th Foot; G. Young, 60th Rifles; C. C. Rutherford, 62nd Foot; G. Hyde, M.D., 69th Foot, and Acting Assistant-Surgeon E. C. Ryall, of the Staff. Capt. Macquarie, of the 63rd Regiment, being the senior officer, is in command of the troops on board the Jura.

THE TURKS AND RUSSIANS.

OPERATIONS ON THE DANUBE.—The Government has received telegraphic despatches from Lord Westmoreland, dated Vienna, the 1st of November, to the following effect:—"The French Minister here has just received from the French Consul-general at Bueharest the following telegraphic despatch, dated 30th ult.: 'The movement made by Sadyk Pasha has already caused Gortschakoff to order the troops that had not yet crossed the Dnieper to return to their position on the Pruth and the Danube. Achmet Pasha, by order of Omar Pasha, has quitted Kalarash with 10,000 men, to join Sadyk Pasha. Iskender Bey was to leave Kasseva yesterday, with 4,000 cavalry, and enter the Dobruddcha.

THE WAR IN ASIA.

The Batoum correspondent of the Lloyd writes, on the 14th, that Schamyl was sending his agents to all the chiefs of the Circassian tribes, to incite them to aid him in the annihilation of the Muscovites. The majority of the chiefs answered Schamyl's agents that they could not engage in the struggle "until the Ottomans could convince them that it was possible to conquer the Muscovites;" in other words, that as long as the Russians were not at a disadvantage, the tribes of the Caucasus, with the exception of the Tschetschenzes, Ossiers, and Lesgiors, will not rise against them. This is the reason of the change in the conduct of the Abasians, who revolted immediately upon the fall of the Russian coast fortress of Tschekety, but now, when the Turks have shown themselves unequal to their enemy, refuse to co-operate with Schamyl. The Russians were being reinforced from the Caspian Sea and from the Caucasus, and there was no doubt that they would shortly recommence hostilities. Ismail Pasha was daily expected at Batoum. The Bashibazooks were ravaging the interior of Anatolia, and stopped both trade and agriculture.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Oct. 26.—Advices from the seat of war in Asia state that the Russians occupy Tojrak Kale, and threaten Kars.

OCTOBER 30.

The following promotions, dated the 27th inst., have this day taken place, consequent on the decease, on the 26th inst., of Vice-Admiral of the Blue Richard Arthur, C.B.:—Rear-Admiral of the Red William Fitzwilliam Owen, to be Vice-Admiral of the Blue; Rear-Admiral of the White Sir Charles Sullivan, Bart., to be Rear-Admiral of the Red; Rear-Admiral of the Blue Edward Boxer, C.B., to be Rear-Admiral of the White; Captain William Sandon, to be Rear-Admiral of the Blue; Retired Captain John Fitzgerald Studdeley has been promoted to the rank of Retired Rear-Admiral on the terms proposed in the London Gazette of the 1st of September, 1846, but without increase of half-pay.

THE PACIFIC.—From a San Francisco paper we learn that the Ond Nederland, that arrived at San Francisco on the 12th of September, reports having spoken, July 31, in lat. 30 deg. 30 min., long. 159 deg. 51 min. W., a British and French fleet, consisting of eight vessels, one of which was a steamer.

SHIP-BUILDING IN BRITISH AMERICA.—According to the advices from British North America, the impetus given to ship-building by the speculative prices lately current on this side shows no abatement. On the 30th of September there were eighty-seven vessels building at St. John's (N.B.), of an aggregate burden of $1,740 tons, and thirty at Quebec, of an aggregate of 26,340 tons, making a total of 117 ships and 108,050 tonnage.

A RUSSIAN WAR STEAMER AT LARGE.—The Trieste Observer states from Constantinople that the Russian war steamer, which some time ago destroyed some Turkish trading vessels, has again made her appearance in the Black Sea under British colours, and burnt, off Kilia, a Turkish vessel laden with coals.

RUSSIAN LINERS.—"Sir, Can you or any of your correspondents inform me, and through me the public, where the twelve Russian ships of the line, stated in Parliament at the commencement of the war, and just before the blockade of the Baltic and Black Seas, to be in various quarters of the globe, now are?"—JOHN THOMPSON, Armagh, Oct. 30."

DINNER TO CAPTAIN M'CLURE.—On Monday a dinner was given to the hero of the Arctic regions, at the Swan Hotel, Hastings, by the inhabitants of Hastings, among whom the gallant captain has for some years taken up his residence. The chair was taken by the Mayor, Chas. Clift, Esq., supported on the right by Captain M'Clure and the Rev. J. A. Hatchard and the Rev. J. Wallis; on the left by P. F. Robertson, Esq., M.P. for Hastings, and G. Scriven and W. Crake, Esqs., and between ninety and 100 of the resident gentry and tradesmen of the town, filled the body of the room. After an excellent dinner, served up in the excellent style of the host, Mr. W. Carswell, the usual loyal and local toasts were drunk, also the health of Captain M'Clure. The gallant captain returned thanks, and attempted to narrate his adventures in the frigid north; but he had such a severe cold, coupled with such a hoarseness, as not to be able to make himself very audible. It was painful to the captain to relate, and it was painful to the audience to listen, so he desisted, promising at some future period to detail his adventures in search of Sir John Franklin and his discovery of the north-west passage. The party broke up at ten o'clock.

STEAMERS.

THE MEDITERRANEAN.—SOUTHAMPTON, Nov. 2.—The Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company's ship Candia, Captain J. S. Field, arrived here this morning bringing the heavy portion of the East India, China, Mediterranean mails, in charge of Lieut. Poole, R.N., Admiralty agent, and dates from Alexandria to the 20th, Malta the 21st, and Gibraltar the 25th ult. The Candia brings 110 passengers, among whom are 10 women, 11 children, and 39 privates of the Royal Artillery from Malta. W., the screw transport-ship Jura, bound for the Crimea with troops. The Jura had lost her bowsprit. From Gibraltar we have accounts to the 28th ult. The Austrian war steamer Radetky, eight days from Greenhithe, arrived on the 25th. The Peninsular and Oriental Company's steam ship Nubia, with the outward India mails, of the 20th ult., arrived at Gibraltar on the 25th, in four days 10 hours from Southampton, and proceeded to Malta and Alexandria. The screw steamer Orontes, six days from Liverpool, touched at Gibraltar on the 25th ult., on her way to Alexandria. A French frigate passed through the Straits of Gibraltar, to the eastward, on the 25th. The British screw steamer Army and Navy left Gibraltar the same day. The screw steamer Melita, 14 days from Constantinople, and five from Malta, left Gibraltar for Liverpool on the 5th. Two French frigates, names unknown, passed the Straits from west to east on the 25th.

RE-OPENING OF THE OVERLAND ROUTE VIA MARSEILLES.—We learn by submarine telegraph that the authorities of Marseilles have commenced this day to issue clean bills of health to vessels leaving that port. The quarantine of fifteen days lately imposed at Malta, on arrivals from Marseilles, will therefore be abolished, and passengers for India, &c., by the overland route will be again enabled to proceed via Marseilles.

THE BIO SHIP AND A LONDON SQUARE CONTRASTED.—A bare statement of the dimensions of the large ship which Mr. Scott Russell is just now building scarcely conveys a notion to the majority of minds of its vast size, capacity, and cost. An ingenious friend of ours, Mr. Gould, has jotted down some points of comparison between the ship and Tavistock-square, and these serve to make the idea much clearer. He points out that Tavistock-square consists of 56 houses, and that there are 15 houses on one side, of 25 feet frontage, or 450 feet. It would require nine from the other side, or 225 feet, to make the length of the large ship; viz., 27 houses, or equal to 675 feet. Then the house being 42 feet deep, it would require two houses put together to make the section of the ship, which is 83 feet; so that it would actually require all the houses in the square put together in two rows to make a block the size of the big ship, setting aside the angles cut off in coming to the keel. Again, the inhabitants of the square may be considered eight to a house, or 448 souls; whilst the ship will some day carry four times or five times as many, say 2,240 or 3,000 souls. At any time of winter the 56 houses in the square will probably have 10 tons of coals each, or 560 tons; whilst the big ship will take nearly 20 times as much, or at least 10,000 tons, for its own consumption. To carry the comparison one step farther, the cost of the 56 houses to build would be about 112,000*l.*—the furniture 58,000*l.*, or 170,000*l.* ready to be inhabited. This ship, it is supposed, will cost 450,000*l.* or 500,000*l.* before it is ready for its inmates! Rather striking, this.—The Builder.

PORTSMOUTH, Nov. 2.—The Neptune, 120, Captain T. Hutton, bearing the flag of Rear-Admiral Plumridge, and the St. George, 120, Captain H. Kyres, have arrived at Spithead this afternoon from the Baltic. The other sailing ships, including the Prince Regent, 90, and Monarch, 84, are reported as not far from Spithead. As the Neptune came to an anchorage at Spithead she saluted the flag of the Commander-in-chief, Vice-Admiral Sir T. J. Cochrane, which the Victory, flag-ship, returned. Sir Thomas Cochrane was out in the cutter Fanny, and signalled from her to the Neptune, inviting Admiral Plumridge to dinner to-night. The Neptune and St. George came up to Spithead with almost all sail set, and the spectacle presented by these magnificent three-deckers was truly grand and imposing.

MALTA, Oct. 30.—The Vectis has left for Constantinople, with important despatches. The Euphrate, which left Constantinople on the 20th, reached Malta on the 29th, damaged. She was the bearer of despatches from Lord Raglan, which have left by the Hellasport.

NEW YORK.—Three million dollars were appropriated at the last session of Congress to construct six steam-frigates of war, and they are all under weigh; two of them being built in Norfolk, Virginia; one in Charleston, South Carolina; one in Philadelphia, one in Boston, and one in New York. The first five are built at the public navy yards, by the naval constructors. Nobody supposes that they are capable of building first-class steamers, for they never have done it; yet they have wasted millions in these abortive efforts. They will doubtless make improvements on what they have hitherto done, and give us respectable ships. But we have more substantial hopes from another quarter. There was an universal desire out of the navy to have the construction of the largest and most important of these six steamers, confided entirely to Mr. George Steers, who became so widely known as the builder of the yacht America; and the secretary of the navy gave him the commission. Mr. Steers is immeasurably the most competent of all the American navy constructors. He has built the strongest, the fastest, and the best steamers, clippers, pilot-boats, and yachts. He does his system infallible; and, thus far, he has succeeded perfectly in accomplishing everything he undertook. He has engaged to give the Government the strongest war-steamers, and, in fact, the strongest vessel ever built in America, and he guarantees to make her under canvas, 17 knots, or nearly 20 geographical miles per hour, and 17 under steam alone. If he accomplishes the work, he will have achieved what is now regarded generally among naval constructors as an impossibility. The extreme length of this frigate is to be 345 feet; beam 55; depth of hold, 31; and 5,350 tons, American carpenter's measurement. Her cost is to be about 900,000 dollars. She is to carry twelve 11-inch pivot guns, which are the largest in our service, and she is to be completed in 18 months. She is built of live oak, sea-coast white oak, and Carolina pine. Mr. Dobbin, the Secretary of the Navy, is applauded for having stepped out of the uniform course of his predecessors. He has appointed a young man out of the navy, and given him a carte blanche to go on and build such a vessel as he pleases. The best materials in the world are at his disposal; and those who are most familiar with his system, and best acquainted with the navy, believe that he will make the most splendid and powerful war-steamers ever sent to sea.—Daily News.

FRENCH NAVY AND MERCHANT SERVICE.

ARRIVAL OF THE FRENCH ADMIRAL.—DEAL, Monday Evening.—The Indefatigable, the French Admiral's ship, towed by the Durieu, has arrived from the Baltic, and anchored. The Indefatigable fired a royal salute on her arrival.

RETURN FROM THE BALTIC.—Five other vessels of the Baltic squadron have just arrived at Deal—namely, the Jemmapes and the Tage, 100 gun ships; and the Cocyte, the Laborieux, and the Aigle, steam advice boats. There had previously arrived there the Breslau, the Duport, and the Duguesclin, line-of-battle-ships of the Baltic squadron.

Military.

NEW HEAVY GUNS.—The Corriere Mercantile of Genoa states that the British troops at Sebastopol have some heavy guns of a peculiar contrivance there for trial, invented by Lieut.-Colonel Cavalli, of the Sardinian army. These guns were tried some months ago at the camp of San Maurizio, and were ascertained to have a range of 5,000 yards, with a deviation of little more than 3 feet. The projectile is of a conical form.

RECRUITS.—The bounty for each soldier enlisting has been raised £2, the bounty for the cavalry being now £6, instead of £4, and that for the infantry £7. 15s. The standard height throughout the whole service all round is reduced by an inch.

Medical.

AIDS TO MEDICAL SCIENCE.—The value of electricity as a means of cure in a variety of complaints, more particularly those affecting the nerves, is now generally admitted by the faculty; and its administration in various forms is constantly prescribed. There is one circumstance, however, which has hitherto prevented the efficacy of this powerful remedial agent being proved by comparatively a few sufferers—viz., the absence of any private establishment where it can be administered by an experienced operator, under the direction of the medical adviser; except by obtaining admission to the electrical room of a public hospital, or by attendance at some public institution, such as the Polytechnic; therefore the patient is generally debarred from seeking relief from a source which, in innumerable instances, has proved so marvellously beneficial. The portable galvanic apparatus commonly sold, which, to be of any service, must be extremely costly, are inapplicable in a large proportion of cases, and useless except in skilled hands. It cannot, therefore, be said that they palliate any way this deficiency. To Mr. Mahomed, of Ryder-street, St. James's, is due the credit of having adequately supplied so evident a want. He has recently added to his vapour-bath establishment a room fitted up with every description of apparatus for the administration of electricity and galvanism, in the various modes in which it is prescribed. The instruments, manufactured by Messrs. Horne, Thornthwaite and Co., are of the most complete and finished make, with every recent improvement for regulating and modifying the galvanic current. Mr. Mahomed, whose professional education and practical experience entitle him to the confidence of the faculty, presides over the apparatus, and himself administers the electric fluid in whatever shape it is prescribed, and strictly in accordance with the counsel and directions of the patients' medical adviser. The existence of such an establishment in such hands needs only to be known at once to be appreciated, and all medical men are invited to inspect and judge for themselves.

STOURBRIDGE LODGE OF STABILITY.—At the usual meeting of the brethren of this lodge, held at Brother Brook's Talbot Hotel, the members had the great pleasure of paying a mark of respect to their W.M. (Brother Joseph Aston), who had filled the office for two years, and whose exertions during that time have been indefatigable in the cause of Masonry. The present (to which every member of the lodge subscribed) consisted of a splendid pin and a set of gold studs, each being chastely embellished with masonic symbols.

PACED LODGE OF INSTRUCTION, 234.—This old-established Lodge of Instruction has resumed its meetings at Brother Wyatt's (The Marquis of Granby Tavern) Down-street, Piccadilly. The chair is taken every Tuesday evening, at half-past seven precisely.

APOLLO UNIVERSITY LODGE.—The first meeting of this lodge this term took place on Wednesday evening last, when, on account of the death of the Provincial Grand Master (Brother Rev. C. J. Ridley), the lodge, as well as the brethren, appeared in mourning. The Worshipful Master, Brother W. W. Beach, of Christ Church, being absent from Oxford, the Worshipful Master of the Alfred Lodge, Brother T. Randall, was solicited to preside in the lodge, and to perform the ceremony of Initiation, which he performed in a masterly and impressive manner. Several brethren were passed, and the raising of nine others was deferred until yesterday morning. At the conclusion of their labours the brethren withdrew to refreshment, when the Senior Warden, Brother J. W. Malcolm presided, supported by the Mayor of Oxford, Brother R. J. Spiers, and a large number of the brethren of the Apollo and Alfred Lodges. The meeting was a most agreeable one, and was rendered the more interesting in consequence of its being the first occasion of the two bodies meeting together after a separation of four months. The W.M. of the Alfred Lodge announced that his Lodge would meet on Tuesday next, and invited the brethren of the sister lodge to attend, assuring them that they would meet as cordial a welcome and as hearty a greeting as they had given to the Alfred brethren on this occasion.

POLISH NATIONAL CHAPTER, No. 778.—The sixth convocation of this Chapter was held at the Freemasons' Tavern on Thursday, the 26th of October, for the purpose of installing Principals. The first and second Principal elect-Companion Lord Dudley Stuart, who is ill abroad, and Companion J. W. Adams being unavoidably absent, the only installation was that of Companion H. J. Warren, as J. The ceremony was performed by Companion W. Watson, P.Z., as he only can perform it—in which he was assisted by Companions Blackburn, Signist, and Smith, P.Z.s. The companions subsequently banqueted together, at which Companion Watson presided, with his usual urbanity and kind-feeling, who—in proposing the better health of Companion Lord Dudley Stuart, took the opportunity of alluding to the excellent Masonic feeling which was inherent in the noble companion; although he was identified more particularly in the Polish nation, still he (Companion Watson) believed that any country groaning under despotism would have found a friend in Companion Lord Dudley Stuart; in fact, he made the cause of suffering humanity his own, and should it please the great Architect above to snatch from amongst us our excellent Companion, it would leave a blank, a void, which we could scarce dare hope to see filled up; in fact he is a man, take him for all in all, that we shall never look upon his like again. Several songs and speeches followed, and the Companions departed at a late hour in peace and harmony.

ROYAL YORK CHAPTER OF PERSEVERANCE, No. 7.—This Chapter held a meeting at the Freemasons' Tavern on the 24th of October, Companion Hervey, M.E.Z., presiding, when four qualified brethren were exalted into Arch-Masonry; the visitors being Companion Henriquez, of the Sussex Chapter, Kingston, Jamaica, and Companion Edwards of the Chapter of Pythagoras, Cambridge.

THE BON ACCORD MARK MASTERS' LODGE.—The members of this lodge met at the Freemasons' Tavern on Wednesday last; the business of the evening being the installation of Master for the year ensuing, and the advancing of two Brothers to the sublime degree of a Mark Master, the ceremonies being most impressively performed by Companion Jones, the first Master of the lodge, who, about three years since, journeyed to Aberdeen, and obtained the warrant which was granted by the Supreme Grand Chapter of Scotland, and under which this lodge is held; and Companion Jones was succeeded in the chair by Companion W. Evans, who fulfilled the arduous duties of that office in a manner to elicit the admiration of the Companions; it, however pleased the Great Geometrical of the Universe to suddenly summon him to the Grand Lodge above, leaving a vacuum, which caused a cessation of meetings of the lodge until the present. There was a large assemblage of brethren to witness the installation of Companion Norton, who, after being duly installed, appointed Companion Sir John Delapole, S.W.; Companion Vigni, J.V., Companions Coles and Wheeler, S.D. and J.D.; Companion Lepper, J.G.; Companion Ridway, Secretary; and Companion G. F. Taylor, Organist. The W.M. also invested Companion P. L. Collins with the Treasurer's collar, he having been unanimously elected to that office (vice Companion Norton) at the meeting in April last. Companion Vigni proposed, and Companion Massy Dawson seconded, that a committee be appointed to carry out a testimonial to the memory of the late lamented Companion Evans, and that a letter of condolence, expression of the high esteem in which the late Master was held by the Companions of the Mark, should be forwarded to the widow, which was carried unanimously. Companion King then proposed that a committee be formed for the purpose of carrying out a proposition of which he had given notice by circular—that of offering a testimonial to Companion James Tucker, P.G.M. for Dorsetshire. Companion King said, that many lodges had expressed their earnest desire to subscribe to the testimonial proposed, and he was happy to say that but one feeling appeared to exist towards companion Tucker, that of profound regard and love; for he was one of the truest friends that Masonry had ever known; the Mark Lodge was particularly indebted to him, for he attended the "Bon Accord" in London, a great distance from his home, when the state of his health better fitted him for his bed-chamber. After some further observations upon the subject, a committee was nominated to meet the committees of other lodges, to carry out this matter in a manner worthy the object in view. The minutes of the last meeting have been read and confirmed, the Companions adjourned the meeting to the second Wednesday in December.

ST. ANDREW'S LODGE.—The members of this numerous and admirable lodge resumed its meetings at the Freemasons' Tavern on Thursday last, for the season, after a vacation of four months, Br. Richard Mills, W.M., in the chair, who initiated a Mr. George Lawrence into Masonry, and passed Br. Brooke to the second degree in a manner highly creditable to his position. The charge was most impressively and beautifully given. Br. Dyke was the Senior Warden, and Br. P. M. Linton, with his usual kindness, officiated for the Junior Warden, who was absent. Among other matters of business, it was urged by the W.M. that a Lodge of Instruction was necessary in connexion with this lodge. There was one mentioned in the calendar, which had long ceased to exist, and in fact ought to have been erased from the calendar, as it tended to mislead the Brothers.* This and other matters having been discussed, the Brethren, numbering between thirty and forty, sat down to an excellent supper. The visitors were, Br. W. A. Kennett (Caledonia Lodge), Br. Nealon, of Temperance Lodge, and Br. G. F. Taylor, of the Old Concord. In conclusion, it is but just to award some praise to Br. Brooks for the perfect manner in which he answered the questions necessary prior to passing to the second degree. In all our experience we never saw it done better—in fact, never so well. His perseverance at so early a period augurs well for the future—let officers of lodges follow the example.

SCOTLAND.

BANFF.—The members of the St. John's Lodge held their first meeting of the season on the 23rd of October. Br. James Mason, W.M., occupied the chair, and in his usual masterly style initiated Mr. Alex. Bairn's father into the mysteries of the craft.

THE COLONIES.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.—On Thursday, August 3rd, a grand ball was given at the Masonic Hotel, Cape Town, Cape of Good Hope, by the Brethren of the British Lodge (No. 419), and the Goede Trow Lodge (which is not on the official list in the calendar); the brethren appeared in full masonic costume. A tastefully laid out supper was provided; and after ample justice had been done to the profusion of good things set before them, the brethren adjourned to a splendidly decorated suite of rooms, adorned with the flags of all nations, interspersed with masonic banners, emblems, and divers devices. Terpsichorean amusements then commenced, and were, to use a hackneyed but expressive phrase, "kept up to a late," or rather to an early "hour." Mr. Holt's excellent band was in attendance, and performed its part in an admirable manner. A more agreeable evening has rarely been passed by the brethren in that locality, and we are informed that so gratified were they with the entire proceedings, that a similar entertainment is speedily to be got up, in order that those who delight to "trip the light fantastic toe," may again indulge in their favourite pastime; to bring the brethren, and the fair portion of their families, into fraternal communion, and thus promote that sociability and good feeling which distinguish your ancient and honourable fraternity.

AUSTRALIA.—PROVINCIAL GRAND LODGE.—On the 17th of June, the various lodges of Freemasons met at high twelve, at the Masonic Hall, Adelaide, to celebrate the festival of St. John the Baptist, upwards of seventy being present. The Provincial Grand Lodge was opened in due form by Brother G. S. Kingston, M.L.C., Acting Provincial Grand Master, and the various private lodges afterwards went through their routine business. At about six o'clock the officers and brothers adjourned to the assembly-room of the Napoleon Bonaparte, where a sumptuous banquet was provided by the host, Brother Ramsay. The chair was occupied by the Acting Provincial Grand Master, supported on the right by Brothers Dr. Kent, Deputy Provincial G.M.; Joseph Bagot, M.L.C., and Henry, Prov. G. Stewards; and on his left by Brothers Alderman Lazar, Prov. G. Director of Ceremonies; Gleeson, J.D.; Haires, Prov. G. Pursuivant; Louau, Prov. G. Steward; Dodgson, P.M.; Lambert, and Gosse. Brothers Wickstead, Prov. J. G. Deacon, and Moore, Prov. G. Steward, acted as cronies. The cloth having been drawn, the usual Masonic toasts were honoured, interspersed and enlivened by songs and music. At half-past eleven "Burns's Farewell" announced that the Sabbath-day was approaching, and the knock from the chairman's gavel was followed by instant separation. The universal feeling was, that so pleasant a meeting had never before been held by the craft in South Australia.

[The History of Freemasonry will be continued in our next.]

* We quite agree with the W.M. that Lodges of Instruction are necessary; and, in fact, ought to be much better attended than they are. It is a bad compliment to a Master who has taken the pains to make himself thoroughly conversant with the duties of his position, that his officers are wanting in proficiency. This remark applies, we regret to say, to many lodges in the craft. Our observations are made with a kindly spirit, for the surgeon's best intentions can sometimes only be effected through the medium of first giving pain; but it is our intention to praise when praise is due, and censure when deserved.

CHINESE MARRIAGE IN CALIFORNIA.—In this town on Saturday last, Mr. Assim, a gentleman recently from the flowery kingdom, was united in the holy bonds of matrimony to his fair countrywoman Miss Ah-How-An-Kow, by Justice Husband. The lovely bride accompanied her maternal ancestor home, and the latter afterwards refused to deliver her blushing daughter to her expectant husband until he paid her debts. The matter was finally compromised, however, and Mr. Assim is now one of the happiest of the happy.—Jackson Sentinel.

ATTACK BY 30,000 RUSSIANS.—THE ENEMY REPULSED WITH GREAT SLAUGHTER.

"The Duke of Newcastle presents his compliments to the Editor, and having received from the Foreign-office a telegraphic message from Constantinople, forwards to him a copy, in order that, by publication in the papers of this morning, it may be made known to the public some hours sooner than would be possible through the usual channel of the London Gazette.

FROM LORD STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE.

"Constantinople, Oct. 28, at Midnight.

"The captain of an English steam transport, which left Balaklava the evening of the 26th confirms in great part the information brought this morning by a French ship, and transmitted immediately to London by way of Marseilles. It appears that the Russians attacked the forts in the vicinity of Balaklava on the 25th. Their numbers are supposed to have been about 30,000 men. The attack was unexpected. The Cossacks preceded the infantry. To resist them at first there were Ottoman troops and Scotch. The Turks gave way, and even spiked the guns, which, seized by the Russians, were turned against them. The Scotch, on the contrary, remained firm in their position. Other forces arrived, and the Russians were obliged to yield the ground, remaining, nevertheless, masters of two forts, from which they fired upon our troops. Three regiments of English light cavalry, exposed to the cross fire of the Russian batteries, suffered immensely.

"The French took part in the affair with admirable bravery.

"On the next day, their position was attacked by a body of 8,000 Russians, as well from the side of the town as from that of Balaklava. They repulsed the enemy with great slaughter. Generally, the loss of the Russians must have been very great. It is affirmed that the fire of the batteries of the town had much slackened; and according to the report of wounded officers, some of whom have arrived at Buyukdere, the belief continued that Sebastopol would be soon in the hands of the Allies. This is nearly what has been gathered from several persons who were eye-witnesses of what took place.

"The names of the killed and wounded are reserved for the official occasion. Among the names there is none of a general officer.

"Paris, Saturday.

"News has reached us yesterday from Constantinople, by way of Trieste, to the 22nd.

"The bombardment of Sebastopol, which had commenced on the 17th by land and sea, was continued on the 18th and 19th only from the land side.

"Five powder magazines had been exploded in the town, and five forts, including Fort Constantine, had been dismantled.

"The fire of the Russians was feebly maintained.

"The son of Osman Pasha and five Russian generals had been killed.

"Two sorties by the garrison had been repulsed and three of the enemy's ships had been sunk in the port.

"The Sanspareil, the Agamemnon, the Charlemagne, and the Ville de Paris were damaged on the 17th.

"The last two have had only twenty-five men put hors de combat.

"On the 17th the English fired 5,000 cannon balls. It was expected at Constantinople that Sebastopol would be taken about the 30th October. It having been said that Prince Menshikoff declared that he would burn Sebastopol to the ground, General Canrobert replied that in such case the Russian troops must make up their minds to receive no quarter.

"Varna, Oct. 26.

"The Turkish troops continue to leave for Balaklava.

"Galatz, Oct. 24.

"Omar Pasha's movements are so menacing that Prince Gortschakoff is ordering the Russian troops which had reached the Dniester on their way to the Crimea to halt.

"Vienna, Friday, Nov. 3.

"The Harpy had brought a Russian general and 400 wounded to Constantinople (Oct. 23).

"At Sebastopol by that date, five powder towers exploded. The sinking of the two Russian ships of the line, which for several days threw very heavy shot at the besiegers, is confirmed. One of them was the Twelve Apostles.

"Fort Constantine had been silenced.

"40,000 of the allies check the advance of the Russian reinforcements.

"The British cavalry division, under General Scarlett, had defeated 5,000 Russians.

"Five Russian generals are reported already killed.

"The Lyons Gazette, of the 1st inst., announces the departure for the East of the 6th Battalion of Chasseurs de Vincennes. This corps is, it is said, to be landed at Trebizond, and is to form part of a body of partisans, composed of Chasseurs, Zouaves, Spahis, and Zephirs, who are to operate in Asia, in conjunction with the soldiers of Schamyl. General Mayrui is to take the command of these troops. According to another version, they are to operate against Persia, should that Power, yielding to the suggestions of Russia, declare war against Turkey."

(By Submarine and British Telegraph.)

"Paris, Saturday Morning.

"In a short résumé of the operations before Sebastopol, given by the Moniteur, it says, that on the 17th the French batteries discontinued their fire at noon in consequence of the explosion of a powder magazine, which damaged them. The English batteries continued their fire, and laid the works opposed to them in ruins.

"On the 17th the whole of the batteries, mounting 250 guns, re-opened their fire and continued it all day, causing several conflagrations in the place, and blowing up a powder magazine.

"The bombardment of this day laid the Quarantine Fort in ruins, while the great forts at the entrance of the harbour were shattered and silenced by the fleet.

"During this operation a shell burst on the quarter-deck of the Ville de Paris. Admiral Hamelin was not hurt, but one of his chief aides-de-camp was killed and the rest wounded, together with several other persons who surrounded him.

"Marseilles, Nov. 2.

"Yesterday being the Festival of All Saints, was observed as a strict holiday here, except by the War Department. At an early hour 600 men of the 20th Regiment of the Line marched to the port of the Joliette, and embarked in the new screw steamer the Byzantin, of 1,200 tons, chartered by the Government to convey troops and stores to the Crimea. The Byzantin belongs to the company of Leon Gay, and is the first ship which has cleared out from Marseilles direct for Balaklava. She took on board, in addition to the troops, 3,000,000 of ball cartridges and twenty chests of a projectile lately invented at Metz, and which produces an immense effect at the enormous distance of 7,200 yards. They arrived at Marseilles under charge of an officer of artillery from Metz, who will make a trial of them against the Russians at Sebastopol, should that fortress hold out until their arrival."

THE BALTIC.

The Duke of Wellington, with ten other liners and three paddle-steamer, is anchored in Kiel harbour, waiting events and orders. Captain Watson, in the Impérienne, and a squadron of steamers, are still in the Gulf. As there is no doubt that merchant vessels will endeavour to profit by the short period before ice blocks in the ports, to run out or in, there is still some chance of our people picking up a few prizes. The Cruiser, Conflict, and Amphion, are well on the watch along the Comland coast, and keep a sharp eye on the Russian outport of Meinel.

NTBORG, Oct. 31, 4 P.M.—A large English steam-frigate coming from the North passed the Great Belt this afternoon, not being able to go through the Sound.

EGYPT.

A letter from Alexandria, of the 21st ult., says — "The European residents here were yesterday greatly afflicted on learning that the Vicarary was indisposed. The royal physicians immediately left for Damietta, where Saïd Pasha is staying. It is hoped that his indisposition is not serious. His Highness was expected on the 26th to provide over a ball to be given by him to the principal Europeans, but this fête has now been postponed until further orders. It appears that a band of European refugees had determined to pillage the houses of the principal inhabitants, whilst the latter were at the fête; but the plot was discovered, and the conspirators have been arrested. Six thousand Egyptian troops left this place on the 18th for Constantinople. To fill up the void caused by the departure of these troops, the Government has determined on forming a national guard for the service of the town. The lower classes do not understand this measure, and disapprove highly of it; and accordingly a great number of persons secretly themselves to escape enrolment. The Viceroy has decreed a new tax of ten per cent. on the revenues arising from the estates possessed by the officers and dignitaries of the Court of Abbas Pasha. The Nile is falling, and the season is becoming cold and unhealthy. The prices of our productions keep up, freights remaining moderate."

To-day the Ottawa, belonging to the Canadian Steam Navigation Company, and commanded by Captain Atkins, leaves Liverpool for Portsmouth, where she will embark troops and ordnance stores for the seat of war.

DESPATCHES FROM THE CRIMEA.—It has been remarked that, for some days past, despatches from the seat of war in the East have arrived by St. Petersburg and Berlin more rapidly than by any other way. The following information, given in a private letter, may explain the reason of that fact:—"The electric telegraph between St. Petersburg and Berlin is now established on the direct line of Königsberg and Gumbinnen, so that the communications can be exceedingly prompt. It is said that the Russian Government has made propositions tending to have this line connected with the network of the South German telegraph."

RACING.

"On the green, green turf."

MR. EDITOR.—The racing season is now so far advanced that another fortnight will find us about the last cdb. Little will then be left to talk of, unless we rummage up some of the doings of the past to serve as a guide amid the uncertainty of the future. A few weeks, it is true, will bring us the entries for the Chester Cup and other Spring Handicaps; and these, with the interest attached to the coming Derby, must provide sufficient food for speculation to winter on.

On Monday there was, as usual, a meeting at Tattersall's; and, being settling day, a considerable amount of money changed hands, though several accounts that stood over from Newmarket made no progress, and some few of them are, perhaps, fated to remain in that stationary state till—St. Tibbs's eve. There was some little betting, Rataplan and Scherz being made rattling favourites for their respective engagements; but the state of the odds proved to be no safe index to the result of the races. Several shots were exchanged on the Derby, De Clare unmistakably losing his stable companion, the cautious Greek, from the premier ship. Lord of the Isles, St. Hubert, and Rileman also found support. Wild Dayrell was in force, and closed, with an upward look, at 20 to 1. Frederick and Prince of Wales came in for a share of attention; but whether they are to remain permanently in the market, vice Flatterer and Cruiser, remains to be seen.

Tuesday ushered in the Worcester autumn meeting, and afforded a fair specimen of what may be accomplished at this late period of the year. A numerous attendance, and some good sport on both days, attested the ability of the management. I must confine observation to the principal races touched on in my letter of last week. I was right in presuming that Lady Tatton would not show in the Two-Year-Old Handicap; but, my champion, Poor Dick, although backed, I must own, is likely to remain in obscurity till he mends his pace. Bauldry proved a delicious cake to the fielders, as his name was mentioned in the ring. I missed the winner of the Autumn Handicap, though I put aside the pretensions of the crack. It was too much to expect that Rataplan, fleet and powerful as he is, could concede such lumps of weight. Forty-four pounds and a brace of years must prove a staggerer to any four-year old over a two-mile course. The wonder is, that, even with Nat up, they could have made such a pot of Rataplan. Jack Leeming won easily enough, but I could not place much trust in so uncertain a gentleman. My selections were starters, and one of them was placed. In the Flying Stakes I made a successful sweep with Falcon. The Steeplechase displayed great improvement on the Warwick and Leamington; and let us accept it as the gauge of better things to come. My choice was Needwood or Maurice Daley. In the Hurdle-race, Freedom disappointed me, though he started almost first favourite.

Thursday was set apart for the Epsom Autumn, and I anticipated that the excellent programme provided by Mr. Darling would have ensured a vast attendance. The metropolitan must take discreetly to themselves that the gathering—in spite too, of a brilliant day—was so inferior to the sport—"Tis not in mortals to command success;" but, most assuredly, the worthy Clerk of the Course richly deserved it.

Will your readers allow me to claim some small share of success on the occasion? Of the Autumn Handicap, I wrote that "it had been fortunate enough to secure thirty-one acceptances. Among them is to be found the Cambridgeshire winner, who was handicapped at precisely the same weight he carried at Newmarket; but the 7 lbs. penalty will, I apprehend, damage his chance. Defiance, Hungerford, The Trapper, Wild Huntsman, The Early Bird, Minervent, and others of celebrity, are among the 'contents'; but my present fancy is for Little Harry, Ethelwolf, or Mispah."

And, for another important race, my words were—

"The BENTINCK PLATE is headed by Battle at Sat 13 lb; and I am inclined to think him good enough to carry home the weight; but as his starting may be doubtful, I shall take my venture with Speed the Plough, Noisette, and Brudenial."

After such good fortune I must expect to throw out next week; but let me, at least, cast a glance northward and see what the skill of Mr. Topham holds in store for us. The Liverpool Autumn has its two days. Five races are set down for Tuesday, and a like number for the following day.

THE CROCKETT WELTER CUP. Eighteen nominations. Mile and a half. As the majority of the horses may be ridden by gentlemen, I am disinclined to venture an opinion. It is not impossible that Defiance should again be the victor, but 12st 5lb looks like a stopper. I must prefer the chance of Alonzo and Warwick. Morning Star is well in; and of the light weights Cardsharper strikes me as most likely to do the trick.

SEVEN HANDICAP. It is hardly probable that I should hit the right one out of a lot of thirty-nine, and at a distance of five days. Briefly then let me state my partiality for Hexey, The Melod, and Whalebone. Alonzo, if a starter, must be handy with the winner.

THE TYRE HANDICAP I am disposed to award to Mr. Saxon, with either Evangeline or Bunbury.

On Wednesday we are to have the usual Steeplechase, in addition to the Aintree Plate, and three other races yet to be entered for.

THE AINTREE PLATE has an entry of thirty-five, and as any number of horses, the property of the same owner, will be allowed to start, the difficulty of picking out the winner is greatly increased. Athurium Parr, Bobbiot, and Young Buck, strike me as well in; but I am inclined to stand by the feathered youngster, Ventick.

THE STEEPLCHASE. Needwood has incurred a penalty for his victory at Worcester, and that, I apprehend, will battle his chance at Liverpool. Spring will, in all probability, become a favourite, and may prove the winner; but I expect to see a vast change in the late running and jumping of Messrs. Crabbs and Maurice Daley—Yours,
Friday, 3rd Nov. TONY PRETS.

MANCHESTER. FRIDAY EVENING.

The only business done to-day was the investment of a few "livers" on the Setton Handicap, at Liverpool, which did not extend beyond the first four quoted. Catherine Parr was decidedly the most in request.

In the dip Michaelmas Maid gave way, and Cheddar was beaten. On entering the corse, Weathercock and Orson singled themselves out, and a very fine race in with the two ended in a dead heat; Paclier finished three lengths behind them; Michaelmas Maid was fourth, Sir John Barleycorn fifth, and Humboldt sixth; Hesperus, Little David, and Cheddar were the next three. It will be seen, on a review of last week's sport at Newmarket, that the legitimate racing season closed with a strength of patronage, and a display of generous rivalry, which augur well for the future. Many of the contests were remarkably close and severe; and, in short, the Houghton Meeting, with its peculiar features of attraction—chiefly produced by hay and corn considerations—was never more interesting and successful. In the course of the week 56 races were run, and 361 horses went to the post.

To Mr. Clark, the judge, Mr. Manning, the clerk of the scales, Mr. Hibbard, the starter, and Mr. Starling, the keeper of the course, all praise is due, for the very efficient performances of their respective duties.

FERRETS.

SIR,—I cannot sufficiently thank your correspondent "Rusticus" for his kind offer of answering any questions about ferrets which I may choose to ask, and of which I shall take advantage if he does not think it too much trouble; but, as I do not wish my name to be published, I should be much obliged to "Rusticus" if he would send me his direction, addressed to Edward Morris, Post-office, Rugby (to be left till called for), when I will send certain questions and my real address by return of post.—I remain yours, &c., Mrs.

POULTRY.

To the Editor of THE FIELD.

SIR,—Would you oblige me by inserting this note in your paper, that it may meet the eye of some brother amateur, who can perhaps afford me some information on the two following points. The first is this: Last year I procured some Spanish fowls' eggs of Captain Hornby, bred. Only two chickens were hatched out, I suppose from the shaking the eggs had sustained in their journey to me. These two chickens, cock and hen, have turned out beautiful birds, equal to any I have seen shown, and have the white cheek in full perfection. This year no other cock has been kept in the yard, and, to prevent any mistake in the eggs, the hen has been shut up in a coop by herself every morning to lay; yet, out of thirteen chickens hatched from her eggs, only three have the white cheek, all the rest being more or less red checked, some entirely red. Now, what is the white checked Spanish fowl? Is it a distinct breed, or only an accidental variety? I did believe the first, but now I have strong doubts, and almost incline to the second opinion. The second point I wish to lay before your readers occurred to a friend of mine. Three years ago, he bred or bought (I don't remember which) a Cochlin cockerel, which was as perfect a bird of the breed as I ever saw. It was shown as a chicken the first year, and was "highly commended." The second year it carried off two prizes. So far so good; but, dreadful to relate, this year he wears such a different look, that had I not day by day seen the change going on, I could not now believe it was the same bird. The thick feathering of the legs is gone, the full tail hackle and thick plume on the thighs are gone, while he carries a tail that would be the envy of any barn-door fowl. Now what I would ask is, does the Cochlin fowl often degenerate like this? and, can his chicken be depended upon? I should have mentioned that chickens by him this year, but fair to be like what he was, not what he is. This same gentleman possesses a very fine cinnamon Cochlin hen, that this autumn has moulted to a light buff, covered with round white spots the size of a shilling.—I am, Sir, yours truly,
AN AMATEUR.

Markets.

MONEY MARKET.

SATURDAY, Eleven o'clock.—Consols, 94½.

COUNTRY GRAIN.

LEWIS, October 21.—Here is a larger attendance of farmers at market than we have seen since harvest, and a larger supply of both wheat and barley. There is a disinclination on the part of the buyers to go on purchasing at anything like late prices; hence the corn has gone about, and to effect sales a reduction of 5s. to 6s. per quarter on wheat, and 2s. to 3s. per quarter on barley was submitted to, with much of this latter grain gone home unsold. Beans and peas at nominal prices. We quote prices to the growers: Wheat, red, 72s. to 75s.; ditto, white, 75s. to 82s. per quarter; barley, malting, 34s. to 36s.; ditto, grinding, 31s. to 32s. per quarter; beans, 44s. to 50s. per quarter; peas, 42s. to 46s. per quarter. Averages for the week ending 28th of October: Wheat, 1,591 quarters, at 63s. 6d.; barley, 2,320 quarters, at 32s. 11d.; beans, 30 quarters, at 43s. 5d.; peas, 45 quarters, at 46s. 7d.

FOREIGN.

TURKEY.—EXPORT OF GRAIN.—Board of Trade, Whitehall, October 30.—The Right Hon. the Lords of the Committee of Privy Council for Trade and Plantations have received, through the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, a copy of a despatch from her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople, under date 6th of October, announcing the re-establishment of the freedom to export grain from Turkey. The Right Hon. the Lords of the Committee of Privy Council for Trade and Plantations have also received, through the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, a copy of a despatch from her Majesty's Consul at Vigo, reporting that a quarantine of ten days is imposed at present upon English vessels arriving at that port from a port in the United Kingdom infected with cholera; as also a quarantine of three, five, or eight days upon vessels from a port in the United Kingdom suspected of cholera, according to the nature of the cargo and the length of the voyage.

FRANCE.—The Courrier du Havre states that a very considerable fall in the price of wheat has recently taken place in some of the markets in that neighbourhood. At Yvetot it has declined 6d. per sack of 200 kilograms; at Caudebec, from 5s. to 6s.; at St. Valery, from 4s. to 6s.; and at Caudebec, 3s. per hectolitre. At Neubourg, in the Eure, the advance has stopped, and there has been a slight decline.

TURF TALK.

"The chosen sport of a great and a free people,"

OUR SAILOR KING.

THE SPORTING WALLET.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

The Newmarket "series" being concluded, the legitimate season may now fairly be said to have reached its close. This year's figures show a falling off at head-quarters, compared with the last campaign; but, during the half-dozen meetings, lasting twenty-seven days, we have had 949 competitors for 191 races, the clear value of which amounted to £43,415, viz. :—

	Days.	Races.	Stakes.	Worth.
Craven Meeting	5	34	140	£8,950
F. S. Meeting	5	29	102	10,325
S. S. Meeting	3	14	56	1,165
F. O. Meeting	3	19	94	5,890
S. O. Meeting	5	39	193	8,500
Houghton Meeting	6	56	364	8,585
Total	27	191	949	£43,415

The above amounts, however, are irrespective of match forfeits and compromises, which are heavy. We shall allude to those, and other matters connected with the Newmarket meetings, in a future number.

The recent accession of the Duke of Beaufort, and others of the "right stamp," to the Jockey Club, must be hailed with pleasure by all who have the true interest of the Turf at heart; and we earnestly hope that there will be a speedy revolution of things at head-quarters.

An alteration in the time of closing the Doncaster St. Leger entry, and also in the conditions for the Doncaster Cup, is contemplated. Both are needful. The first-named event would not only be benefited by the entries being made at the same time as the Derby and Oaks, but by penalising the first and second for the Epsom Colt prize. A larger field would be ensured.

Andover and Virago have given Bay Middleton and Pyrrhus the First a very seasonable lift, as their service prices have been increased to 50 and 40 guineas. Considering the position the son of Sultan and Cobweb has long held in the list of sires, and the excellent running of Andover and the Hermit, we are not surprised at the Danebury rise; but the figure for Pyrrhus strikes us as being too heavy an advance. In 1852 his price was 12 guineas; last season it was 16 guineas; but, although neither Aribbas, Catastrophe, Constancy, Deerstalker, Epinician, Freddy, Harriet, Haruony, King Alfred, Lamprodes, Neoptolemus, New Warrior, Ptolemy, Pyrois, Village Lass, have reflected the speed and stoutness of their sire as yet, he has advanced 21 guineas more. The latter filly, it will be remembered, was his only successful offspring last year, winning thrice out of ten essays, and netting but £555. On the other hand, Bay Middleton had sixteen winners last season, who won thirty-eight races, and realised £9,700. Melbourne, Orlando, and Lanercost, alone outvied him, and their produce netted £21,475, £14,695, and £10,425 respectively. Pyrrhus the First, it must be admitted, however, has not, in his early stock, had a chance of affording us any decisive proof of his transcendent qualities as a sire, for the visits paid to his harem at the commencement of his career did not embrace the names of any very aristocratic patronesses. Notwithstanding this heavy rise, we think he will have a good season, and a much hotter class of visitants than hitherto. We hope he may, for he deserves it. Stockwell, Kingston, and Newminster, will make their debut during the coming season, in the stud paddocks at Burleigh, Middle Park, and Tickhill Castle. It is doubtful whether The Reiver will not shortly be added to the list. There is a wide difference in the 250 guineas he recently fetched and the 1600 guineas Mr. Shelly gave for him. Virginia, the dam of the clipping Virago, and the daughter of Rowton and Pucella, is again in foal to Pyrrhus the First, and was recently sold for 400 guineas.

TURFIANA.

CAPT. LANE'S Artaxerxes in the Newmarket St. Leger, 1856, is a wrong nomination, that horse being now two years old.

To Baron Rothschild's nomination in the Midsummer stakes at Newmarket, 1856, add 4lb.

To the LEVANT STAKES at Goodwood, 1855, add Mr. Merry's Voivode. In the same stake, Mr. R. E. Cooper's nomination should be—c. by The Libel, or Don John, out of Balcan, not The Czur.

Mr. ALLAN McDONOUGH purchased the steeplechase mare Laura, by Arundel, at the Armagh races, on Friday, the 3rd inst., for £75. Since the 25th of October Laura won three cross-country events, viz., the Ulster Steeplechase, at the Maze, and the County Plate and Howard's Plate, at Armagh. She is an exceedingly good looking mare, and in the hands of her present sporting owner will, no doubt, pay her way.

QUEEN'S PLATES.—By order of his Grace the Duke of Wellington, Master of the Horse to her Majesty, the following alteration has been made in the Queen's Plate, usually run for on the Thursday of each September meeting at the Curragh:—Two years old in future to carry 6st.; three ditto, 8st. 10lb.; 3lb to mares and geldings. One mile and a half.

THE OFFICERS at present quartered in Dublin have fixed the first Monday in December for a day's steeple-chasing over the County Castle course. Mr. J. Doyle, V.S., has, in the handsomest manner, presented a valuable gold-mounted whip as one of the prizes. The match between Mrs. Allan McDONOUGH and the Knight of Glynn, as noticed in our last, for a cool hundred, will take place on the same day.

THE PROGRAMME OF THE CURRAGH APRIL MEETING, 1855, has already been published in Hunter's Irish Racing Calendar. It contains no less than sixteen events, including three Queen's Plates, the Wellingtons, and the First and Second Class of the Madrids. The entries for the two last named Stakes appeared in the FIELD of the 28th of October.

THE FOLLOWING MARES are in foal, their produce to run for the Angleseys at the Curragh, in September, 1857:—La Gazza Ladra, to the Last of the Barons; Cayrice, to the Knight of the Whistle; Sunita, to Portait; Janita Perez (three years old), to Simon; Dolly's Brae, to Dough; Makeaway, to Tearaway; Duchess de Guiche, to Vintean; and Daphne, covered by the Dean, Bandy, and Oxonian. For this, the principal two-year-old race, in Ireland, fifty-eight mares have been served by the following stallions:—Seahorse, Barbarian, Bird-catcher, Horn of Chase, Cruzier, Annandale, Warhawk, Bandy Cotherstone, Chanticleer, Faugh-a-Ballagh, Kingfisher, Surplice, Thistlewhipper, Frenzy (dead), Brown Molton, Falstaff, and Grey Dragon, besides those first mentioned.

THERE are nineteen nominations to the Sligo Stakes, to be run at the Curragh, in October, 1857; and twenty-eight to the Pagets, same meeting.

THE Portlavington Stakes at the Heath Races, next year, has twenty nominations.

SIR THOMAS BURKE'S Fleda (first called Sally Bernard), by Maggie, is reported to be in foal to Kingfisher.

A GOOD WEEK WITH THE PUCKERIDGE HOUNDS.—These hounds met on Monday, 30th of October, at Bennington. Found in Coombwood, and, at the end, a fast twenty-five minutes, ran their fox to ground near Hightrees. Found the second fox at the Thrift Wood, and killed him.—On Wednesday the meet was at Stanstead. Found at Ugly Park, went away through Broomwood, Guendon Wood, and Guendon Hall Park, and after taking a wide ring with a very bad scent, was killed near Broom. Found the second fox at Houghty Wood, gave him two rings in cover, then away at a very quick pace, and killed him in the open; time, fifteen minutes.—On Thursday (bye day), they met at Widdford. Found at Eastwick Wood, ran twenty-five minutes nearly all in cover. Reynard then took refuge in a drain, but was soon dislodged, and gave him a good start; but another ten minutes brought to hand.—On Saturday they met at Cumberlow Green. Found at Cold Ashspring, scent very bad; ran him a ring of forty, and killed him. These hounds hunt a bad scenting country, but I am happy to say it shows more than a fair average of sport.—I am Sir, yours, RED ROVER.

CAPITAL DAY'S SPORT WITH THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND'S HOUNDS.—On Monday the 6th inst. these hounds met at Wackerfield, and being the first day of public hunting for this season, and a favourite meet, a goodly muster of the right sort assembled in expectation of a good day's sport; which, from the excellent condition of the hounds, under the care of George Cox, well known in the county of Hants, (who has succeeded the late T. Flint as huntsman), to whom too much praise cannot be given, he having brought out his celebrated hitch pack for the occasion. A few minutes before the appointed time his Grace arrived, and after exchanging the usual "good morning" with a few of the gentlemen present, mounted his favourite hunter Napoleon, and gave orders for Black Thorns to be drawn, which proved a blunk. Cox then trotted off to Bolton Garth Plantation, where the pack had no sooner entered than the well-known tongue of old Trinket told us that Reynard was on foot, and in a few minutes foxes were seen flying in every direction. After taking two or three rings in cover, our fox, finding it too hot to hold him, then broke and away at a racing pace by Hilton Gorse, from thence in the direction of the Staindrop and Bishop Auckland road; but Reynard thinking it more prudent, entered a drain, that proved open for his reception, after a hurrying run of thirty minutes. Before many minutes had elapsed, a fresh fox was viewed crossing the same field, when Cox quietly took the hounds up and laid them on the line, when the hounds soon settled to their fox, which went away at a good hunting pace in a direct line for Bishop Auckland's, turned to the right, crossed the Hammer Beck road into Bolton Garth Plantation; making no stay, he broke away at the south side of the cover, taking the open to Morton; from there to Killerby, heading his course for Dobinson's Whin, from thence to Bolam; here he turned to the right, crossed the Auckland and Piersse Bridge road by legs across on to Toytot Gorse, but disdaining to enter, pressed nobly forward for Redworth Main Earth, but meeting with disappointments he took a direct line to see his native country once more; but having the wind in his teeth, he was obliged to turn down wind again, still the pack going at a racing pace. Here Cox was heard to cheer his hounds, exclaiming "Now my lasses," and soon they ran from scent to view, when after a good run of fifty-five minutes he was nobly pulled down in the open, making five brace of foxes this gallant pack has killed in eleven days. The way in which Cox rode to his hounds, and the manner in which he handled the pack during the day, was the admiration of all present.

A GALLANT DAY WITH THE SINNINGTON HOUNDS.—On Tuesday, the 31st ult., these hounds met at Sinnington. The morning was everything that the lovers of the chase could desire, and long before the time appointed hundreds of pedestrians, and upwards of sixty gallant Nimrods graced the field, and although there were several showers, we noticed a good sprinkling of the Sinnington ladies present. At eleven o'clock the dogs were harked into cover, and soon the well-known voice of the merry huntsman, and the mellow notes of music, proclaimed to the expectant hunters that Reynard was on foot. He broke covert in fine style, and made for the earths, but did not find things as he expected, so he made for the Hag, scaled up the wood to the Appleton Common, then back to the Scar along the river Seven, which he could not be compelled to leave, being run for twenty minutes in full view, when he was at last pulled down in the river. The worry over, the hounds were again put into covert, and the loud tallyho! hark forward! resounded from glen to glen, and away went the jovial pack with lightning speed, round and round the merry green woods, over the river Seven, round Appleton Common, back to the woods to the earths, and was pulled down in the river Seven. The hounds then trotted over to Aislaby Whin, found in an instant, from there to Aislaby Middleton, and high side of Keld Head, where, after a good run, he got to earth, and thus finished one of the best day's sport seen for many years at the Sinnington meet.

THE WARWICKSHIRE HOUNDS.—The first meet of the Warwickshire hounds for this season took place at Kineton on the 30th ult., when, after a sumptuous breakfast given by the noble marquis of the hounds, Lord Willoughby de Broke, the pack left the kennels for Bowshot, where a fox was found. They ran him to Walton, where he was lost. They then found a second at Lighthorne Rough, which, after running to Chadshunt Spinney, returned to his former quarters, and went to ground. On Thursday the hounds met at Edstouehall, and ran a fox, which was started at Ansty Wood, for two or three hours, when he escaped. On Friday the meet was Burton Toll-gate. There were two or three short but brisk runs. The North Warwickshire met on Wednesday at Stoneleigh Abbey, where the hospitalities of that princely mansion were dispensed by Lord Leigh to a very numerous assembly of sportsmen, including the most distinguished members of the hunt. There was a large company in attendance, and several carriages were on the ground. The pack, which is in splendid condition, drew Berricote Wood, where no fewer than six foxes were found. Their run into the open ground was delayed for some time, owing to the large number of vehicles and pedestrians. At length one got away, and after passing along the Grove, made for Thuckthorne, where he was killed.—Birmingham Gazette.

MR. ASHETON SMITH'S HOUNDS met at Shoddesdepe Gate on Monday last, and had a pretty hunt of eighteen minutes from Asheton Coppice, killing their fox near Amport.

A SLENDID RUN WITH THE DURHAM COUNTY FOX-HOUNDS.—On Monday, the 6th, these hounds met at Colpike Hall; the morning was rather sunny, and sportsmen unaccustomed to the district might suppose too fine for scent; however, as anticipated by those who have witnessed many a brilliant thing from this extremely good meet on a similar morning, the scent proved good enough for men, horses, and hounds. However, tried a few outlying gorses, they proceeded to Rippon Burn Plantation, where they immediately dropped upon the family. After a few ups and downs, one of the heads of the establishment faced the open, and turning down to Broadwood took the valley of the Brownie, as far as Batsfield Burn, then turned south to Latly. Here, being headed, he directed his course due west towards Wolsingham. He then crossed the Lobley Hill-road, and passing Broomshields across Pan Burn up to Hill Top over Cornsary Common, turned down to Hedley Common, past Cowsley, the almshouses, up to Cornsary; then rounding the hill down to Lower Row, past Cornsary House, north, to Ragpath side, near Clickhim, turning east to Square House. He then turned to Greenwell Plantation, and down to Hollybush-wood, where occurred the first check, after a run of nearly two hours. Having then tried every earth within a circuit of fifteen miles, he resolved to return to his own immediate locality, and doubled back again past the Ford Gardens, with only three of the hounds carrying the scent. A view holloa from the Roman station, brought the pack again upon his heels. He then passed Middlewood, Throstle Nest, Hole House, Patrick's Close Mill, up to Browne Bank Toll Bar, then to Batsfield, where they ran in view and killed him, after one of the most splendid runs ever known in that country. Time two hours and twenty minutes, with only one check. The master of the hounds, Mr. Williamson, throughout manifested his delight at the magnificent working of his pack, and at the effective and praiseworthy services of Tom, the huntsman and the whip, and those of the field who were fortunate enough to witness the run from its commencement to the finish, will long remember it as one of the most extraordinary for duration and speed they ever knew.

FORFAR AND KINCARDINE FOX-HOUNDS.—This celebrated pack opened the winter campaign on the 3d inst. very auspiciously. The turn out of members of the club and others was considerable, the former embracing the Right Hon. Lord Paunure, Major Douglas, Colonel Rait of Anniston, John Guthrie, Esq., of Guthrie Castle, W. F. Grant, Esq., of Ecclesgreig, Captain Guthrie, Oagie House, Robert Taylor, Esq., of Kirktonhill, John Binny Gibb, Esq., of St. Ann's Cottage, — Ramsay, Esq., son of the late Sir Alexander Ramsay of Balmain, John Jolly, Esq., Cairnbank House, &c. &c. The start was from the handsome kennels in the policies of Brechin Castle, which have recently undergone enlargement and improvement. The first whip, Mark Jones, in absence of Mr. Markwell, the huntsman, who had lately received an injury while in the discharge of his duty, conducted the chase in capital style. The hounds were thrown off at Maulesden cover, and it was not long before a fox was started; but it again soon took to earth. After this they trotted to the Careston cover, and again found; but, owing to the bad scent, it was "no go." They then dodged along to the Marcus cover, and started as fine a game one of dark complexion as ever ran o'er hill or dale. He drew the pack a circuitous route over mountain and lea—indeed, the longest run that ever this crack pack has had to contend with. They hounded along, after giving hound's law, by the Hilton of Fearu, and, passing the sawmill, took to the Grampan Hills; and with a bound, dashed down the vale of Lethnot—and was lost. Only a few of the riders were up at the concluding point, many a brave rider having had to quit the field long before the unhappy finish; but there was no brush got to the indefatigable pursuers. This was considered one of the finest days that ever the followers of this pack have enjoyed. The run extended upwards of twenty-five miles, perhaps the longest ever run in Auld Scotland. On Friday, they met again at Lauriston, when on cover being drawn Reynard was found, and broke away at a rattling pace. After a smart run of half an hour the "varmint," sought and found shelter in an open earth in Brotherton Dens. The field was not so full as on Tuesday. The meet yesterday was at Burnside. On the hounds being thrown in a welcome note from the tongue of an "old un," proclaimed the "find," but after a short run he was run into, in a vain attempt to earth. As a wind up to the business of the day, they trotted on to Finhaven Hill, where again they found Reynard at home, who after circling the hill, made a most brilliant burst, running eastward with the hounds in full cry, passing the ruins of Melgund Castle, but again a friendly earth gave him protection. We are glad to say that Mr. Markwell, the huntsman, is so far recovered, that he was able to resume his seat in the saddle, and brought home at his saddle-bow part of the trophies of the day—the head of the first found turkey stealer.

FOX-HUNTING AT WINSLOW.—Lord Southampton's hounds, at their meets in this locality this season, have, as usual, found an abundance of foxes, and four brace have already been killed in this district.

TIPPERARY HUNT.—On Wednesday last there was a very numerous meeting of "red coats" at Kilcommon demesne; and, as might be supposed from the fact that many years have transpired since that ground was hunted, foxes were in abundance; however, they could not be brought to break cover, and even the two "brushes" that were borne off by the huntsmen were not trophies of any exciting chase. Reynard seems to have many secure places of retreat in the splendid thicket opposite Caher Cottage.

THE CAMBRIDGESHIRE HUNT.—We are glad to hear that the pack is again in full force; their first meet was on Monday last, at Caxton Gibbett; the hounds were never in better train, and much credit is due to the kennel management and the new huntsman, who hunted his hounds with an indifference scent, and stuck to his fox over a very difficult country, eventually killing, after two hours and twenty-five minutes. The following is the account of the run from another correspondent:—"The first meet of the Cambridgeshire hounds was at Caxton Gibbett, where a large field assembled to meet the worthy 'Squire'; a small cover was drawn by the roadside blank, then trotted on to a place called Natchley or Napely Grove; here one of the right sort was found, and after one hour's ring through the cover went straight away towards Caxton. Here a slight check took place; but soon at him again, crossing the north road to Caxton Bottoms, where another check took place, held on the road towards Bourne, and then again hit off at Lord de la Warr's, bending towards Hatloy; turned again to the left across the north road and to Kingston Wood. At this place the hounds got on capital terms with their fox, and sent him across by Kingston village at top pace, over the hill to Eversden Wood, and after once running round the low corner, they ran into him on the edge of the wood. The run from beginning to end was two hours and twenty-five minutes, during the whole of which time the hounds were exceedingly well handled by Morris, the new huntsman, who appears both in and out of cover to know what he is about."

NEASDON HARRIERS.

The first full meet of these harriers was on Saturday last, and a splendid day's sport there was. Some of our country friends will be surprised to learn that within five miles of the Marble Arch, in the beautiful suburb of London, which lies between the Edgware-road and the Harrow-road, a pack of harriers is kept by two gentlemen, whose character as sportsmen is widely and well known.

On the brow of one of those charming slopes which encircle, in gradually increasing and undulating lines, the northern and western environs of London, stands a white-looking mansion, occupied by Mr. Henry Hall and Mr. Cheslyn Hall, two bonny hachelors.

The first named is usually called "The Squire." Each can, however, lay true and rightful claim to that time-honoured title, for not in England can be found men who in their conduct, character, sentiments, and tastes, more worthily represent the sport-loving, hospitable, kind-hearted race of English "Squires," now alas! growing scarce. However, in this charming locality these gentlemen live, and they farm their broad acres in a manner which ranks them amongst the best agriculturists of the day. They have cattle of the best breed; they have a separate establishment for breeding racers and hunters of the purest blood; they hunt like gentlemen, and live like little princes—jolly and jovial, gentle and generous.

And well selected was the spot for the meet—namely, Brandesbury Park, Willesden, the residence of Henry Vallance, Esq. Brandesbury Park is on the rising ground on the left of the lane leading from Kilburn to Willesden, and though only three miles from the Marble Arch, it is as secluded and country-like as if a hundred miles away. The mansion is in the midst of Brandesbury manor; it has no pretensions to external beauty; but it has a most "comfortable inside." It was formerly the property of Lady Salisbury, and the residence of Sir Countess Trotter, afterwards of Baron Hambro', but for four years past has been unoccupied.

The mansion is surrounded by about fifty acres of park, beautifully timbered. The pleasure grounds are most beautiful. The gardens, vineries, &c., are of first-rate order, and the coppices, ponds, walks, shrubberies, &c., are so artistically arranged that the visitor may walk in this little paradise for hours without being fatigued with the same scene. Every turn discloses some fresh beauty, and the stately trees and beautiful flowering shrubs add a charm and value to this place which good taste in the original arrangements and time alone can produce.

At this spot was the first "lawn meet" of the Neasdon Harriers. The Squire and his brother and some friends were invited to breakfast, and the genius of true English hospitality might well be proud of such a reception.

At nine the harriers were brought in front of the mansion, so that the ladies might see the pack and field, and a charming and beautiful picture it was.

The Squire hunts his own hounds. There he was behind his pack on a steady, wiry-looking horse. A few yards from him were the two whips, and about two dozen gentlemen formed a semicircle round the Messrs. Hall, whilst here and there in different parts of the park were seen some curbing in their steeds, others pacing up and down, with cockaded servants in dark liveries in the rear, and in the carriage-drive might be seen a brougham "uncarting its deer" (for a hat and feathers graced the meet), and a dog-cart turning out its "fast" contents.

After this parade the Squire went to work: a few fences in the adjoining fields were carefully looked over, and then the hounds were put into one of the Brandesbury copses. In a few minutes a forward but cautious one of the pack mumbled something; again he spoke significantly, and immediately the music-sweet melody for the gladsome hearts of men and horses—burst forth from the whole pack, and they were in full cry.

Again stillness reigns—the scent is bad: still the huntsmen "lifted" them on with a cheer and brought them up before the scent was entirely cold.

A beautiful scene was presented. The hare doubled back into the shrubberies, ran into the lawn—out again—across the park, with bounds and horses in full view; took them for a gallop towards Kensal-green, then back again—across the park and towards the shrubberies—then stole away into the open country; but was killed at last within one hundred yards of the start. During all this time, the ladies of the family and their visitors were on the lawn (separated from the park by a sunk fence), and appeared to enjoy the sport to a degree, for the hares, when hunted from the covers in the park, would, after a run into the copses, and thence into the open country, return to the shrubberies again, so that for hours together there was one scene of excitement.

Thoroughly did every one enjoy the sport. We cannot spare room for the details of the day, but must content ourselves with saying that the Squire's harriers killed five hares.

Never was better sport, or a more delightful day, known. All enjoyed themselves to the utmost. In the evening, we understood, the Messrs. Hall and a few friends dined at Brandesbury; and we have heard a whisper that a curious match was made, which is to come off on Monday. What it is we know not, but we advise our sporting friends to keep an ear open for anything that may transpire; and, we may add, that whatever the sport is, we will chance a trifle, and back the Squire.

Fortunate are they who are in the confidence of Messrs. Hall, and have their name on the privileged list for a card of the meet of the Neasdon Harriers—still more fortunate if they find the meet to be "Brandesbury-park, Willesden."

NOTES FROM MELTON MOWBRAY.

To the Editor of THE FIELD.

"Your face is venerated since we met, old friend."

SIR,—In consequence of the din of war's alarms, the excitement of racing and the fact that we do not hunt in Leicestershire in the summer, you and I have had but little to do with each other lately; but I suppose our turn will come now, for our men are as anxious to have their gallant deeds in the field chronicled as ever Admiral Dundas, Charley Napier, or General Canrobert may be. But Sir, this season has been one in a thousand. We have never experienced such a succession of dry weather, and scarcely in the memory of man has such a time occurred for getting horses in condition; for, whether it is believed or not, I assure you that we have scarcely had a shower of rain since last March, and scores of farmers for miles around this neighbourhood are even now driving their beasts, sheep, and horses long distances to drink. The ground is consequently in such a state that fox-hunting is as much out of the question as to expect to see hay-making on Christmas-day. I do not like to hazard an opinion in contradiction to older heads than mine, but for once I will say what I think; and that is, that there is scarcely a single stud of horses either in the town or neighbourhood fit to go for half-an-hour at anything like a pace. They are all short of those pipe-openers which are absolutely necessary when you want the colt by Dare'em out of Catch'em to win a Derby. The meet on Monday last, with the Quorn, was as usual at Kirby Cato, and, singular to relate, not one gentleman left the town of Melton in scarlet. It would be a burlesque to attempt to give you an idea of the first week's sport; therefore I can only add that you must do as we do here when we want to hear of any great event—wait till it happens. There are lots of foxes, plenty of men and horses, and we only want rain. I shall not fail to tell you the events as they arise, and remain, Sir, your most obedient servant,

KINOTON COURSING MEETING.

Judge—Mr. WARWICK.

This little, though splendid affair, came off on Monday and Tuesday last, on the grounds in the occupation of Mr. Wright, of Chadshunt; and, we must say, more excellent sport could not have been afforded for the gratification of the numerous spectators. The course between Bess (the winner) and Vortex, in the first tie, was one of the most exciting and severe ever run—indeed she won, but cleverly, showing she had no mean opponent; and, to use the expression of an old coursing, "No hare could live long before such a pair." Hares were played tiful and conformedly strong, giving a good test to the qualities of the long-tails. Bomarsund's running deserved notice; he is a capital dog, and will play snoko with many before the season's out. The dinner after each day's coursing, at the Red Lion Inn, did great credit to Mr. S. Garrett and his charming sisters; every thing was first-rate. Upwards of forty gentlemen sat down, and most of them remained "at it" "until morning,"—a proof of the excellence and good qualities of his wines and spirits. Chairman, Mr. Wright; Vice, Mr. Lepage. The following is a return of the running:—

COURSING AT FRAMPTON.—THE OPENING DAY.

On Wednesday last the lovers of coursing met at Frampton, on the estate of Sir Theophilus Biddolph, to try the speed and stamina of their long-tails. The weather was propitious, the game plentiful, and the dogs, generally speaking, in good condition. The field also, considering it was to have been a great day, was "pretty numerous." This being what may be termed a trial day, hope and fear was depicted on many a countenance, since many of the owners had vied with each other, and spared neither expense or trouble, in improving the breed of their favourites. The performance of most of the dogs did credit to their trainers, and was a proof what breed and good management was capable of doing. There was but one set-off against the dogs, and that was the hardness of the ground, which certainly told against them. There were fifteen brace of greyhounds sent, and we are sorry to relate that one, a very promising white dog, belonging to Mr. Hands, returned no more, as he fell dead when near the finish of a very severe struggle, and became stiff in a very few minutes. Amongst those who owned the dogs were T. Heyton, Esq., Kilsby, Mr. Russell, Mr. J. Marton, Mr. T. Laurence of Thurstleton, Mr. R. Cowley, of Kilsby, Mr. J. Parnell, of Rugby, Mr. Hicken Bourton, Mr. Blundell, Mr. Boddington, Rugby, —Black, Esq., of Toft, Mr. Haude, Mr. Blick, of Rugby, &c. Judging from the performances of the day, the following gentlemen were entitled to the palm:—Mr. Hicken, Mr. Heyton, and Mr. Boddington. The game appeared to spring in all directions in a field of not more than six acres; upwards of twelve hares gave leg bail for their appearance. The hill country afforded a most excellent view to the company; more than a dozen hares had their gallop stopped; but how many lived to run another day it would puzzle the wits of a Philadelphia lawyer to say. The sport throughout was exceedingly good; but to say all we were pleased with the result of the day would be stating too much, as sentence of death was passed upon some which last season were the pride of the neighbourhood; but such is life, as we see in our daily walks, that the potted of one hour become the despised of the next; and it would appear that greyhounds are not an exception to the rule.

T. W. UTON WRIGHT.

SPORTING MISCELLANEOUS.

BISON HUNTING AT TAYMOUTH CASTLE.—A hunt of a most unusual and extraordinary character took place at Taymouth Castle on the 25th ult. On the previous day the Duke of Leeds arrived at the Castle; the next morning his grace, accompanied by the Marquis of Breadalbane, Lord Panmure, Hon. C. B. Phipps, Keeper of the Privy Purse; Sir John Pringle, Bart., Sir Alexander Campbell, Bart., Major Baillie, Mr. Menzies, of Chesthill, and Mr. H. Aitken, proceeded to enjoy the sport of hunting bison, of which wild natives of the North American prairies there are several fine specimens at the castle. The sport went on with great spirit and excitement, and a bison was brought down at the first shot, promptly secured, and carried off the ground.—Edinburgh Courant.

CAPTAIN ALBERT EVELYN ROWLEY, of the Grenadier Guards, whose death at Sebastopol has been announced, was the second son of Sir Charles Rowley, of Hill-house, Berkshire, whose family have filled a distinguished position in the naval annals of England. Captain Rowley had been nine years in the service. Few young men in his position were so fond of race-riding; and, in the saddle, Frank Butler never went straighter. His disposition, besides, was of the kindest nature; and in the meetings round London, where we were wont to see him perform, all were attracted to him by the attributes of his character.

CURIOUS BRAD.—Mr. Cuthbertson, Ayr, while shooting in the parish of Dailly, on Wednesday, killed a bird which has all the appearance of a hybrid betwixt the black cock and pheasant. It has the tail of the pheasant, barred, but shorter, and pheasant wing. The head and breast plumage are those of the black cock, and the legs are feathered. The foot is that of the black cock.—Apr. Advertiser.

ESQUIMAUX SPORTING, NEAR BEHRING'S STRAITS.—"One mode they have of catching the bear is by a piece of frozen blubber, in which is doubled a piece of whalebone. The animal greedily swallows it—the blubber thaws, the whalebone stretches, and the brute dies in agony."—Letter from an Officer.

EXTRAORDINARY CAPTURE.—A singular circumstance occurred a few days since at Salcombe. A large cormorant was seen to pitch in the water just below Salcombe, and, after swimming about for some time, it soverely struggled and then partly disappeared. The ferryman, a person named Trole, who had watched the movements of the bird, rowed to the spot, when he found one of the wings and a part of the body above water, the remaining parts being swallowed by a large monk-fish. Both the fish and the bird were immediately captured by the boatman, who cut open the fish, in order if possible to save the life of the bird, but without avail, for it died shortly after. The fish weighed 10lb., and the bird 8lb.

TWO SPECIMENS OF A RARE BIRD, the American ostrich, have been killed at Fort des Moines, in Iowa. They stand five feet high, are four and a-half feet long, and have bills six inches in length, straight and very sharp.

UNSPORTSMANLIKE CONDUCT.—The feelings of the sporting public of Oxford and its neighbourhood have been considerably aroused at the conduct of some miscreant, who, on Sunday night or Monday morning shot a fine vixen fox on Gosford Hill Farm, a few miles from Oxford. We hope the miscreant will be discovered and brought to condign punishment for committing so great an atrocity against the sporting laws of this country. W. B. Ferrand, Esq., in the expectation of doing so, has offered a reward of £2 to any person who can give information that will lead to the detection of the party who shot the fox.

BERLIN, Nov. 6.—Last Friday, the 3d instant, being St. Hubert's Day, the king held the usual wild boar hunt at Grunewald, a wood a few miles distant from Berlin. The costume that prescription seems to have established for the monarch on this occasion consists of a black velvet surcoat, with white kerseymere "down-below," and a round black hat. The rest of the field affects the English sportsman's costume—scarlet coat, top-boots, and leathers. This exciting mediæval sport, the danger of which makes it so attractive to the huntsman and so interesting to read of in books, is here followed in true courtly style. The king rides at the head of the field at an easy canter, while the actual chase is pretty much confined to the dogs and the boar; but, as soon as the former have pulled down the latter, the most enterprising of the horsemen spring forward, dismount, and hold down the poor beast. The dogs are then whipped off, and, as soon as his Majesty comes up, an attendant hands him a couteau-de-chasse, with which he cuts the animal's throat. This catastrophe puts a term to the lengthy period in which the "wild" boar has been kept tethered in Grunewald, and during which time his tusks have been subjected to various precautionary processes, calculated to insure the safety of his Majesty and his liege subjects, in case the animal should attempt a closer acquaintance with them than etiquette authorises.

A SUMMONS FOR THE BLACK SEA.

[From the Morning Herald.]

SIR.—An article appeared some time ago in your journal suggesting that supplies of warm clothing, &c., should be sent out on private speculation to our troops in the East. This would, no doubt, prove a great boon to our poor fellows could any check be put on extortion; but much might be done for the relief of the army in general were the yacht clubs to join in the patriotic impulse which now animates the whole nation.

High-born women, accustomed to every luxury and refinement, have nobly offered their services to attend upon the sick. Surgeons, chaplains, and priests, have likewise volunteered. Let our gentlemen yachtsmen of England now stand forth and get under weigh, instead of laying up their yachts for the winter. Let them show their seamanship and humanity by volunteering a voyage to the Black Sea. Let them freight their vessels with those articles enumerated in the Morning Herald of the 25th ult., take them out to Sebastopol, and issue them at prime cost. They may thus be the means of saving many a valuable life, and many a poor starving and shivering fellow-creature would bless the generous yachtsman who thus came opportunely to his relief, or who sent that relief by deputy, which would answer just as well. The expense to those who can afford to keep a yacht would be of little moment; it would keep their crews in "wind," and serve to accomplish a noble end.

LONDON MODEL YACHT CLUB.

The monthly meeting of this club was held on Tuesday evening last at Anderton's Hotel, Fleet-street; and, when the commodore and vice-commodore took their chairs, at eight p.m., we observed the following members present:—Rear-Commodore Gordon, the Hon. Secretary, the Standing Counsel, Messrs. Armitage, Bertram, Bennett, Boulter, Gibbins, Wilson, Luxton, Maybury, Howard, Swift, Gibson, Richardson, Cullen, Clemow, Harrison, Moss, Johnsonburg, Kent, Biffin, Hain, Huxtable, Webb, Frost, and some others, with a good sprinkling of visitors also. The minutes of the previous or October meeting having been read by Mr. Secretary Crabb, Commodore Tuckwell moved their confirmation, which was unhesitatingly agreed to. Messrs. Gibbins and H. C. Moss then superintended the balloting, at the conclusion of which, Messrs. Alfred Ford, W. Reed, and A. Moore, were declared duly elected, but Lieutenant Maturin's name was withdrawn to be inserted among the life-members. The commodore having been the umpire on the occasion of the recent private sailing-match between five of the 12-foot club yachts, for a subscription purse, now made the necessary remarks thereon, and also referred to the incidents of the closing trip, which came off on the same date, and was wound up by a dinner at Greenwich, at Dowson's, Portland Hotel. He stated that the match was certainly a good one, that the Mary Ann took the lead down, and that he had never seen a little boat better handled; but that the light wind on the return seemed more suitable to the Volante than to her, and, that, reaching the goal, as the competing yachts did, after dark, he and others could hear them, yet could not well see them, and he was therefore mentally of opinion it might have perhaps been better to have had the match resailed, but, that, at the dinner, when Mr. Bertram had left, Mr. Cullen made no objection to the "first boat in" taking the prize. Mr. West therefore took the first prize (£5), and Mr. Richardson the balance of the purse as a second prize, the former gentleman celebrating his good luck by an immediate presentation of wine to the "mess" then present. The commodore also mentioned that Mr. Edwards, of 49, Fleet-street, although as yet no yachtsman, and Mr. Trickett, formerly of Plymouth, but now of the Bull Inn, Bishopsgate, had each generously sent a golden donation to the race-fund, for which he begged to return thanks to them, and indeed to each and all of the subscribers to the purse above referred to. The motion of which the Hon. Secretary had given due notice—relative to the club-circulars, the printing fund, postage, and stamped envelopes—was, together with an amendment moved thereon by Mr. Armitage, and seconded by Mr. Luxton, referred, by the carrying of a second amendment, moved by the standing counsel, and supported by Mr. Maybury, to the sailing committee, who were instructed to report thereon to the club at 6 p.m. on the first Tuesday in December. Thus Mr. Crabb's motion and Mr. Armitage's amendment will be considered together, and each receive the fullest attention. The commodore proceeded with the business of the evening by reading Rule 2, as to the annual nomination of officers, to be elected in December, and to take office in January, 1855. The officers necessarily to be nominated on Tuesday last were the commodore, vice-commodore, rear-commodore, hon. secretary, standing counsel, treasurer, cup-bearer, two auditors, and the committee for sailing and general purposes. Commodore Tuckwell first addressed the club, and resigned office, holding it only, like a Cabinet minister, till his successor is appointed; and he gave the reasons for his resignation, touching on his business avocations, which required most of his time, and on other points. Messrs. Bertram, Maybury, Gibbins, Gibson, Tuckwell, Williams, Moss, Biffin, Huxtable, Crabb, Wilson, Knight, Armitage, &c., next spoke to the subject before the club (the nominations); and after some little discussion and explanatory conversation, the following were found to be the nominees:—

For Commodore.—Messrs. Tuckwell, Williams, Biddle, jun., and Samuel Hewitt.
For Vice-Commodore.—Mr. Williams.
For Rear-Commodore.—Mr. J. P. Gordon.
For Cup-Bearer.—Mr. H. Williams.
For Hon. Secretary.—Mr. Crabb.
For Standing Counsel.—Mr. W. Knight.
For Treasurer.—Mr. Clemow.
For Sailing Committee.—Messrs. Biffin, Wilson, Armitage, Gibbins, Purnell, J. Gardiner, jun., and Ham.
For Auditors.—Messrs. Wilson and Luxton.
For Librarian.—Messrs. Crabb and Armitage.
For Flag-Maker.—Mrs. Farley, Fleet-street.

The Vice-Commodore finding himself proposed as commodore, made a merry speech, declining any higher post than he already filled, and suggesting that even for this a better man might be named [we doubt it], while he himself should not be called on to reserve unless no one else could be procured. In that case, continued he, I would serve, for while I am alive depend on seeing me ever among you; but, "as to hoisting me again into office, pray regard me merely as a storm-jib, and don't look me out till it comes to blow." (Laughter). Candidates names were next taken for the December ballot, including Mr. W. H. Martin, of Doddington Grove, (per letter from Mr. E. A. Lloyd); the names of members in arrears with their subscriptions, were called for; and then the Commodore brought forward several other matters for consideration: viz., that the Sailing Committee should always meet an hour before the club assemblies, to arrange the order of business for the evening (such to be a rule in the new book); that letters of thanks be written to Messrs. Trickett and Edwards; that Mr. Huxtable, 29, Charing Cross, be the officer to supply the club-buttons, he having himself already gone to the expense of a die, thus saving club expenditure, and that his name be printed as such officer in the club-book. After this, the vice-commodore gave a notice of motion to again increase the club tonnage to its original amount, viz., eight tons; whereupon Mr. Luxton gave notice that eight be struck out and ten inserted, and then the commodore read the fundamental rule, and the secretary the minutes of June 7, 1852, and the standing counsel addressed the club, and the upshot is that the tonnage bids fair to be soon raised to eight or ten, instead of remaining at five, tons as at present. It was originally eight, but was decreased out of courtesy to the P. W. Y. C., now again raised to fifteen tons, so that the L. M. Y. C. may well resume its eight-ton law, and not interfere with or injure any of the other river clubs.

THE ANNUAL DINNER will come off at Anderton's, on the first Tuesday in December, at nine p.m. (the 96th monthly meeting, the completion of eight years), and twenty gentlemen have already paid Mr. Clemow for their tickets. Apply at the bar at once.

PRINCE OF WALES YACHT CLUB.

The monthly meeting was held at the club-house, on the 3rd inst., the vice-commodore in the chair, in the absence of the newly-elected commodore, absent on a matrimonial cruise.

The minutes of the last meeting being read and confirmed, and the following gentlemen duly elected, T. H. Wilson, Esq., Captain R. B. Bowden, W. L. Griffin, Esq., Edwin Gunner, Esq., and T. T. Wall, Esq., owner of the Idas, 6 tons. The notice of motion given by Mr. Bain for the appointment of a rear-commodore, and to confer the honorary appointment thereof on the late commodore, as a mark of respect for his services, was put to the ballot, seconded by the treasurer, and the numbers were ayes, 19; noes, 13. The motion was lost, it requiring double the number of ayes to carry it. The gentlemen opposing this notice did so not from any desire of treating the services of the late commodore with disrespect, but from an objection to creating the office of rear-commodore, and a notice of motion was subsequently agreed upon to meet the views of all parties, and was given by Mr. Neil Campbell, viz., that rule 2 be altered, by adding the following words, "and that the club have power to confer brevet rank on retired officers," and that the late commodore be elected to the brevet rank of rear-commodore in the colonies.

The report of the Sailing Committee on the notices of motion given by Mr. Legg, was then brought up and read by the secretary, and was as follows:—

"Report of the Sailing Committee, made the 23rd of October, 1854, at a Special Meeting convened for the purpose. Present—Messrs. P. Turner, E. Guest, J. P. Dormay, A. Berneville, J. Gardiner, T. Ayckbourn, and C. F. Crabb.

"The 1st Notice.—That Rule 2 do terminate at the word 'March' in the fourth line, all the words following to be omitted."

"The committee consider, that the object of new officers elected in March, taking office in April, is to give the old an opportunity of completing the year's business, as also to initiate the new in their duties, and they find this is the ordinary rule in other clubs. That the object of giving notice at the previous meeting of any new officer is, that officers may not be suddenly removed without due consideration, and to give the members an opportunity of ascertaining, if new officers are to be proposed that they will be efficient and proper. The committee are, therefore, unanimously of opinion, that the proposed change is not only unnecessary, but would be detrimental to the interests of the club."

"The 2nd Notice.—That in Rule 4, the words one guinea be erased, and half-a-guinea substituted in lieu thereof."

"The committee having investigated the affairs of the club, and duly estimated the necessary expenses for carrying on the same, and heard the treasurer at considerable length, are unanimously of opinion that it would be highly injurious to its interests to reduce the subscription to half-a-guinea."

"The 3rd Notice.—That in Rule 10, the words him and in the sixth line be omitted."

"This having been done by a resolution of the club on Mr. Lilley's motion in August last, is unnecessarily again made the subject of a notice of motion."

"The 4th Notice.—That Rule No. 17 do terminate at the word committee."

"The same remark applies, as that to the foregoing notice of motion."

"The 5th Notice.—That in Rule 29, the words or officers in the second line be erased."

"The committee consider that this rule affords a great protection to the club, and the same remarks apply as those to the first notice of motion."

"The 6th Notice.—That in Rule 32, the three concluding paragraphs be omitted, and that it terminate at the word 'neckchief'."

"The committee consider, that the uniform was agreed upon with the full consent of the club, and as members are not compelled to wear any distinctive marks at all, and as the officers are desirous of continuing the uniform as at present authorised, and as they find such distinctive marks in other yacht clubs, particularly the Royal Northern, Royal Irish, Royal Western of Ireland, and others, they see no objection to such uniform, and are unanimously of opinion that it would have a prejudicial effect on the club, to alter the rule as proposed."

"The 7th Notice.—That Rule 34 do terminate at the word 'wreath' in the 4th line, the remaining words to be omitted."

"The committee are of opinion that the rule, as it stands, implies merely that proper respect should be paid to the commodore; and as they find a rule of the same purport in the Royal Mersey Yacht Club, they think the proposed alteration unnecessary, and could be of no advantage in any respect whatever to the club."

"The 8th Notice—That Rule 41 be erased from the laws. The committee find this to be a novel rule, as it exists in the Royal Irish, with a fine of £10; and they consider the rule, as it stands, a very proper one, and can find no reason whatever for supporting the notice of motion in this respect."

"The 9th Notice—That No. 20 of Sailing Regulations. The words three members of the club, one to be chosen by the owner of the yacht, and two by the Sailing Committee, be erased, and the words "the Measuring Committee" substituted."

"The committee consider the rule, as it stands, most convenient for the purposes of the club; as, were it changed to the Measuring Committee, and no quorum of them attended, the yachts could not be measured, as would have been the case at the last match, when only two measurers attended, and the committee appointed a third for the purpose of making the quorum required."

"The committee also find the rule precisely the same in the Royal London Yacht Club, although they publish the names of their Measuring Committee in their book of rules."

"The 10th Notice—That the paragraph immediately following Rule 20 of Sailing Regulations be erased from the book."

"The committee consider this paragraph a most proper general direction to members, and that can not possibly be objected to by any well-thinking member, upon due consideration; and they find it in the precise terms in the rules of the Royal Western of Ireland, and in the Royal Cork Yacht Clubs."

"The committee beg generally to add, that though according the perfect right to members to bring forward any notices of motion for altering existing laws, they regret the foregoing notices should have been given at the present time."

"CHAS. F. CHURCH, Hon. Sec."

The notices were then severally put to the ballot, and the numbers were:—No. 1, ayes 13; noes 23. No. 2, ayes 16; noes 23. Nos. 3 and 4 were abandoned. No. 5 found no second. No. 6, ayes 11; noes 28. No. 7, ayes 13; noes 23. No. 8, ayes 12; noes 23. No. 9, ayes 12; noes 21. No. 10, ayes 10; noes 25.

The whole were consequently lost.

The annual ball was fixed for Thursday, the 11th of January, at the Club-house, Freemasons' Tavern.

Eight gentlemen were proposed for the next ballot.

[We shall give a full report of the annual dinner in our next.]

We extract the following from the Morning Post of yesterday:—"Thursday being the anniversary of the birth of the prince—after which this club is named—the members dined together at the Freemasons' Tavern, under the presidency of their new Commodore (Hewitt), their late commodore being now on his way to our Australian Colonies. At the conclusion of the dinner, which was very elegantly served, the Chairman proposed 'The health of her Majesty as a pattern to her sex, beloved by her people, and respected by the world.' The toast having been drunk with loud applause, the health of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales was given, a hope being expressed that ere long he might become in reality what he at present is in name, the patron of the Club. To this succeeded 'His Royal Highness Prince Albert, and the rest of the Royal Family.' The Allied Armies and Navy—might success attend their efforts, and the Czar of Russia be taught that the age of tyranny and oppression had passed away; and 'Prosperity to the Prince of Wales Yacht Club.' These toasts having been respectively duly honoured, Dr. Bain said they had recently read in the public prints of a deserted vessel drifting in under the very guns of Sebastopol—all who beheld her position believing that she was devoted to destruction, when, luckily, a steam-frigate bore boldly in and brought her out in safety. A few months ago, in consequence of their late commodore going abroad, their club, which had hitherto been eminently successful, appeared devoted to destruction, when they found a steam-frigate in the person of their present commodore, under whose guidance it had not only been brought out of danger, but appeared likely to take even a more prominent position than hitherto. (Cheers.) In looking through the yachting events of the past year in a sporting publication, he found that no yacht club had taken a more exalted position than the Prince of Wales. (Cheers.) In one match no less than thirteen yachts had contended for the prize, and the little Musquito had not only proved herself worthy of the club in the waters of the Thames, but had borne its fame round the coast, where she had carried all before her against every competitor. Trusting that the club might long be under the guidance of their excellent commodore, he begged to propose to the club to drink to his very good health, and as he had lately become a married man, prosperity to his family. (Cheers.) The Commodore returned thanks for the honour conferred upon him, and trusted that ere long the fame and prosperity of the club would be increased ten-fold to what it had hitherto enjoyed. The healths of Vice-Commodore Knibbs, Mr. Turner (the treasurer), Mr. Chubb (the secretary), and other toasts, were then drunk, and the company did not separate until a late hour. A military band was in attendance, and Mr. and Miss Taylor also added, by 'their sweet voices,' to the enjoyments of the evening."

ROYAL MERSEY YACHT CLUB.

At the meeting of the club, on Tuesday evening last, at the club-house, Duke-street, Liverpool, which was well attended, it was resolved to hold the annual club ball on the 4th of December, the proceeds to be given to the Patriotic Fund of the United Services—a proposition which was most enthusiastically supported. The members spent a very pleasant evening, and the prospect and object of the hall seemed to be cheering to all present.

POOLE-BUILT YACHTS.—THE BACK WATER.—There is at present a larger number of yachts laid up in the water above the bridge than has ever been known before; there being three schooners, viz., the White Shark, Genevra, and Lalla Rookh, and several fast cutter-yachts, and a quantity of small craft; the whole of which (except the Genevra) were built at this port, and have proved to be the fastest yachts of their tonnage.—Poole Herald.

LETHBRIDGE.—A few days ago we understand Lord Panmure's tenantry in this parish, headed by Mr. Clark, his lordship's factor, enjoyed a day's shooting. Twenty guns were employed, and nearly 200 hares were killed. All parties seemed to enjoy themselves, and to look forward to another day's sport at no distant period.—Brechin Advertiser.

ROWING.

"We shall feel obliged by the Secretaries of "Rowing Clubs," and others forwarding their Appointments of Matches or Notices of Meetings to come, at their early convenience."

MATCHES APPOINTED.

November 20.—T. Cole (the Champion of the Thames) and J. Messenger, of Teddington, to row from Putney to Mortlake, for £200 a side.

November 21.—Colquhoun Silver Sculls, Cambridge.

November.—Robert Newell and William Pocock, to row from Putney Bridge to the Ship at Mortlake, for £25 a side.

PUNT RACE.—A match for £100 a side has been made to row in punts from Hilly to Oxford, between John Bosson and Sampson Beesley, both well known as first rate punters. On a former occasion they contended on the Port Meadows Stream, when Beesley won the race, but lost the stakes, in consequence of fouling his opponent. The match will cause a great deal of speculation, both having plenty of friends to support them.

EXETER COLLEGE CANOE RACE.—An interesting canoe race for a silver challenge-cup, presented by Mr. Oliverston, a member of Exeter College, and tankards for the first and second best, to be paddled for by members of that society, came off on Monday; the distance was from Exeter barge to the long bridge and back. Five canoes started, and after a plucky race Mr. Gilder came in first and Mr. Douglas second.

TORONTO ROWING REGATTA, CANADA.

The races, says The Toronto Daily Patriot, commenced on Tuesday, Oct. 3, as advertised. The morning, however, was cloudy, and portended squally weather; notwithstanding which a large number of our citizens congregated at Clendinning's Hotel, on the Peninsula, expecting to see the race. The steamboat Victoria (kindly granted by the Grand Trunk Railway), had Scott's Brass Band on board, and when we state that "Cue" was on board, our readers may rest assured that every arrangement was complete.

The course marked was from a boat moored opposite Clendinning's Hotel, thence eastward to a crib moored at the eastern end of the Bay, around this crib, then westward to a buoy west of Clendinning's, thence to the place of starting, in all three miles.

FIRST RACE.

About half-past one o'clock on Tuesday, everything being in readiness, the following four-oared gigs arranged themselves at the place of starting, to compete for a purse of $40, viz., Arrow, Black Swan, and Gipsy.

The race, which was for three heats, best two in three, was well contested, and was won by the Gipsy. When drawing for places the Arrow won the inside, the Gipsy next, and the Black Swan next.

After everything was arranged, the word "go" was given, and the boats started off with a rush, the crews of each straining every nerve in order to pass the crib at the east first. The Black Swan, however, soon took the lead, which she kept the whole way, and came in about 100 yards ahead, the Arrow coming in next, and the Gipsy last.

After an interval of ten minutes, the boats again prepared to start, and soon the splash of the oar told that they were in motion, and determined to contest the race to the very last. It soon became evident that the contest would be between the Black Swan and Arrow, both of whom were equal, and in this manner passed the crib. After passing the crib, the Arrow took the lead, which she kept, and came in about forty yards ahead, the Black Swan next, and the Gipsy a good distance behind. A heavy shower of rain coming on put a stop to all further proceedings for some time. After the rain had cleared off the boats again came up to the mark, and soon were again in motion, with as much determination to win as ever. The Arrow, however, soon took the lead, which she kept the whole way through, and came in about two lengths ahead, the Black Swan close behind her and the Gipsy nowhere. Average time, 18 minutes.

SECOND RACE.

The second race, for the championship of the Bay and $20, was very well contested, and won by Mr. Thomas Tinning. The race was but one heat—three miles. The following boats entered for it:—The Phoenix, rowed by Mr. James Reddle; Her Majesty, rowed by Mr. Thomas Tinning.

As soon as the boats started, Her Majesty took the lead, which she maintained to the end, and came in several lengths ahead. Time, eighteen and a half minutes.

The afternoon becoming unpropitious, the races were compelled to be postponed till the next fine day; and Thursday being pretty fine, the sport again commenced about two o'clock.

THIRD RACE.

The following boats started for the two-oared match, for a purse of $20, viz.: Arrow, J. Clendinning; and Sea Pigeon, John Tinning. The race was easily won by Sea Pigeon, the Arrow apparently resigning the race.

FOURTH RACE.

The fourth race, for a purse of $20, to be contested by none but fishermen. The following boats entered for it: Challenge, Michael O'Hara; Red Rover, David Ward. This was a most beautifully contested race, the boats running neck and neck most of the way. It terminated by the Challenge coming in a length ahead of her very determined opponent.

FIFTH RACE.

The fifth race for the Club Purse; two prizes; for the first boat a silver cup, value $20; second boat, a flag presented by the ladies. The following boats started:—The Gipsy, W. Dillon, four single oars; The Arrow, J. Clendinning, four pair sculls; The Sultan, T. W. Clarke, three pair sculls. This was the closest and most exciting race of the whole, as the boats were all "crack" crafts, their respective friends hetting large sums on the result. At the start the Sultan, being the shortest and heaviest boat, to the surprise of all, led the first mile. She was then caught by the Arrow, the Gipsy close after. The race now lay between the Gipsy and the Arrow, both crews making every effort to win. After passing the last buoy, the Gipsy took the lead, which she kept to the end, winning by about a length. The Sultan coming in last by about ten seconds. Time, 14½ minutes.

SIXTH RACE.

The next race, for a purse of $20, for boats pulling three pair of sculls and under. Mr. Clendinning's Arrow, three pair sculls; Mr. Clarke's Sultan, three pair sculls. In this race the Sultan took the lead, and soon had it all her own way, some of the crew of the Arrow seeming rather green at pulling an oar.

SEVENTH RACE.

This race was for benton boats of the first and third races—the following boats entering:—Black Swan, A. McLean; Gipsy, W. Dillon. This race, which was for a purse of $20, was one of a very exciting description. The Black Swan took the lead round the first buoy, after which the Gipsy came up, and both ran neck and neck to the next buoy; after which the Gipsy got a little ahead, and came in about a length ahead. Time, 14 minutes and 40 seconds.

EIGHTH RACE.

This race was for shooting skills, for a purse of —, for which the following boats entered:—Snipe, George Ronaldson; Yellow Leg, Thomas Tinning. After starting, the Yellow Leg took the lead and kept it round the first buoy, the Snipe then commenced to close up, and headed her at the second buoy, winning by a length or two, after a very hard contest.

On the whole, the races were of the very first order; indeed, we have heard it said they were the best which ever took place on the bay, and we congratulate the Regatta Club for the success which has attended their endeavours to afford amusement to the public.

Great praise also is due to the captain, Mr. Clarke, and the Secretary Mr. McLean, for their unceasing endeavours to forward the interest of the club.

In the evening about fifty sat down to a splendid supper, got up in Clendinning's best style. After full justice was done to the good things provided, the usual loyal toasts were given, and the company separated at an early hour, well pleased with the amusement which had been afforded them by the members of the Toronto Regatta Club.

GLANCE AT CRICKET.

To the Editor of THE FIELD.

Sir,—I cannot allow the letter of "V. R." in your paper of the 14th ult., to pass unnoticed, as he seems to have mistaken my letter by thinking that I wish to go back to the old-fashioned play of pinch-ball, and such stupid things as those. Far from it; I am very much pleased with the rules of cricket as they now stand, and the cricketers of England are very much indebted to the M.C.C. for their care in making them. I wish to make "V. R." understand that when I noticed the changes, that I was not displeased with them; but, as I was showing the history of cricket, it was my duty to notice the changes in the rules. I dare say "V. R." read "the glauc" once, and became irritated because I said a few words about roundhand bowling. If "V. R." will just read my letter again, he will see I was perfectly justified in noticing those changes. "V. R." seems to think I do not like roundhand bowling. Undoubtedly, for the batsman, to play roundhand bowling is by far more scientific. I like to play it best because it is more scientific; but what I said, and still think, that no side ever ought to go out without underhand bowlers, and I will give him an instance in which I played this year; it was against some beautiful bats come from Oxford, who were in the habit of playing roundhand bowling, and obtaining long scores; so we agreed to have two underhand bowlers. The consequence was, when their best bat came in, he was bowled out both times the first ball, underhand, and immediately offered a man a crown to bowl him out in six balls roundhand; but no one could do it. This same person had scored 17 and 11 from Wisden and Gundry the day before. Soon after I played again, when a man regularly swept the underhand, and we put on roundhand bowling, and he was immediately bowled out. So that I still think you ought to have two kinds of bowlers in a match. Perhaps if "V. R." were next year to bowl eleven from one county against eleven from Bucks, he would find Fletcher's swift, twisting underhand want some science to play them. I must now draw to a close, hoping I have strengthened my words, and that I have shown that I am greatly pleased with the alteration. Yours truly, Aylesbury. COCHIN.

commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Edwards; and the Essex Rifles, commanded by Colonel the Hon. Charles Maynard—paraded at a quarter before ten o'clock, in the Home Park. Her Majesty, accompanied by Prince Albert and the royal children, attended by the ladies and gentlemen in waiting, took her position near the East Terrace, when the line presented arms, fired a feu de joie, and gave three cheers for the Prince of Wales. The troops then marched past in slow and quick time, wheeled into line, and again presented arms; after which they marched to their barracks. Dr. and Mrs. Billing and family have arrived at Grosvenor-gate, from Vienna.

Commander B. H. Bunce, R.N., died at Plymouth on Tuesday.

DEATH OF THE COUNTESS OF STRATHMORE.—The premature demise of this young and beautiful lady will occasion a very wide-spread feeling of regret throughout that society of which she was so distinguished an ornament. The Countess died on Friday week at Florence, after a very brief illness, at the early age of twenty-eight. Her ladyship leaves no family.

METROPOLIS.

LORD MAYOR'S DAY.

The inauguration of Alderman Moon, as Lord Mayor for the ensuing year, took place on Thursday with that traditional pomp and pageantry which has so long been connected with this ancient ceremony. The weather was exceedingly propitious, the sun shining with unusual brightness. At eleven o'clock, the procession commenced forming at Guildhall, and a few minutes before twelve started. That part of it in which the flags of England, France, and Turkey, were carried on horseback, attracted considerable attention from the multitude, and elicited loud and frequent bursts of shouting. The procession was conducted with the greatest regularity and order, to Blackfriars Bridge; and thence, by water, to Westminster, where the Lord Mayor and the other City functionaries disembarked, and, being formed into procession, proceeded at once to the Court of Exchequer, where the Recorder proceeded to introduce the Right Hon. Francis Oraham Moon, elected by the citizens of London to fill the office of Lord Mayor for the year ensuing.

The Lord Chief Baron said: "My Lord Mayor, I beg to congratulate you on having attained that honour upon which the learned and eloquent Recorder has expatiated in his address to the Court." His lordship having made some further remarks, Alderman Moon bowed his acknowledgments.

The Lord Mayor was then sworn. The other formalities having been gone through, the Recorder invited the judges to the banquet to be held in the Guildhall in the evening. The procession returned from Westminster to Blackfriars Bridge, and passed through New Bridge-street, Ludgate-hill, Ludgate-street, St. Paul's Churchyard, Cheapside, and King-street, to Guildhall. At the Obelisk, Bridge-street, the procession, on its return, was joined by the Ambassadors, her Majesty's Ministers of State, the Nobility, Judges, Members of Parliament, and other persons of distinction, invited to the banquet.

THE GUILDHALL BANQUET.

The inaugural banquet of the new Lord Mayor took place the same night in the Guildhall, where his lordship and the sheriffs entertained a select party of about 1000 of their friends, including several of the members of her Majesty's administration, according to time-honoured custom. Over the Lord Mayor's seat at the east end of the hall was a very splendid trophy and a large transparency in which the City arms and these of France, Turkey, and England, were strikingly and effectively displayed. In the corners Gog and Magog kept their usual watch and ward over the fortunes of the good city, although we did not learn that their terrific size or ferocious aspects frightened away the appetites of any of the guests. There was an unusual display of flags and banners through the hall, and in the Common Council Chamber similar decorations, with vases of flowers, were displayed. The company, as they arrived, were presented to the Lord and Lady Mayoress in the Common Council Chamber; and in the ante-rooms there were transparent pictures of Constantinople and Sebastopol, with the allied forces grouped very artistically, and the execution of which was much admired. At seven o'clock a flourish of trumpets announced the arrival of the procession from the Common Council Chamber, and the Lord Mayor, with his distinguished guests, preceded by the trumpeters and the civic functionaries, marched round the hall and took their seats on the raised dais at the east end of the hall. The Lord Mayor presided, and on his right sat the late Lord Mayor, and on his left the French ambassador, the Count Walewski. Among the company were the Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Aberdeen, Lord J. Russell, Duke of Newcastle, Lord Clarendon, Earl Granville, Mr. Sheriff Muggidge and lady, Viscount Hardinge, Lord Palmerston, Sir W. Molesworth, the Marquis of Salisbury, Mr. F. Peel, M.P., Mr. Wilson, M.P., Mr. Waddington, M.P., Sheriff Crosley and lady, the Spanish minister, the Swedish minister, the Sardinian minister, the Turkish minister, the Portuguese minister, the Brazilian minister, the Austrian minister, the American and Danish ministers, the Peruvian chargé d'affaires. Opposite the Lord Mayor was placed Miss Burdett Coutts. There were two Indian princes near the foreign ministers, Prince Gholam Singh and Prince Feroze Shah, whose picturesque costumes were much admired; Charles Stafield, R.A., David Roberts, R.A., D. MacLise, Sir W. Paxton, &c.

The dinner was provided by Mr. Staples, of the Albion Tavern, and the following is the general bill of fare:—

250 Turkeys of real Turtle, containing five pints each.	40 Dishes of Tart, creamed.
200 Bottles of Sherbet.	40 Dishes of Almond Pastry.

The wines were supplied by Butler and Co.

Mr. HARKER, who officiated as toast-maker, having proclaimed the loving cup, and given a hearty welcome to the guests in the name of the chief magistrate of the City,

The LORD MAYOR rose, and said the first toast he had the honour to propose was "The health of her Majesty the Queen," whose public character and domestic virtues were unexampled in the world.

The LORD MAYOR then gave "His Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Prince of Wales, and the rest of the Royal Family" (much cheering), followed by that of "The United Armies and Navies of France, Turkey, and England," and I hope the cheers with which you drink it will, on the wings of the press, reach the ears of those who are fighting your battles in the East.

The toast was drunk with much cheering.

Viscount HARDINGE returned thanks.

The LORD MAYOR said the next toast he had to propose was "Prosperity to the City of London and its Trade."

The late Lord Mayor returned thanks.

The next toast given from the chair was "The French Ambassador and the other Foreign Ministers."

The toast was received with enthusiastic cheering, Adams's band, which was stationed in the gallery, playing the national air, "Partant pour la Syrie."

Count Walewski, who was received with loud and prolonged cheering, said—Je vous, au nom du corps diplomatique, remercie l'honorable assemblée qu'il me soit permis tout d'abord de former un souhait auquel, j'en suis certain, tous mes collègues s'associeront sans réserve, c'est que votre administration, my Lord Maire, prenne fin au milieu de circonstances plus paisibles que celles qui signalent son avènement. Mais ce qui n'est pas moins désirable c'est, que le paix que nous appelons tous de nos vœux les plus sincères soit une paix durable, et pour qu'elle soit durable il faut qu'elle repose sur des conditions de stabilité en rapport avec le grand fait qui domine notre époque, et que l'illustre, avec le grand fait qui a changé, ou peut le dire, la politique du monde, et qui doit rassurer sur l'avenir les plus timides comme les plus incrédules. Ce grand fait c'est l'union des deux peuples qui marchent à la tête de la civilisation—c'est l'alliance de la France et de l'Angleterre (loud cheers). La bataille d'Alma, qui prendra place dans les fastes de l'histoire, parmi les faits d'armes les plus glorieux du siècle; la prise de Bomarsund, les port de l'ennemi bloqués dans toutes les mers, ce ne sont là que des préludes, mais qui témoignent assez hautement de ce que cette alliance peut faire et de ce qu'elle fera (cheers). Espérons qu'au moment où je parle les drapeaux réunis de l'Angleterre, et de la France, et de la Turquie, flottent victorieux sur les mers, ou plutôt sur les ruines, de Sebastopol (loud cheers). Nous pouvons sans trop de présomption nourrir cet espoir; car tout doit nous en donner la confiance—la bravoure et le patriotisme de nos soldats, la supériorité de nos connaissances militaires, la noble éducation qui règne entre les deux armées et les deux marines, et, par dessus tout, la sainteté de la cause qu'elles défendent (loud and continued cheering).

The next toast was "The Lord High Chancellor of England and the House of Lords," to which the Lord Chancellor briefly responded.

The LORD MAYOR then rose and said, they had the gratification of seeing among them the Prime Minister, who had done him the honour, on the first occasion of his presiding as chief magistrate of that great City, to attend with his colleagues. He was sure the company would drink their healths with pleasure.

The EARL OF ABERDEEN replied.

The noble Earl shortly afterwards rose and proposed "The Health of the Lord Mayor, and thanks for his kind and liberal hospitality that day."

The LORD MAYOR acknowledged the compliment, and gave "The Health of the Judges and Chief Baron Pollock," to which

The CHIEF BARON responded.

The next toast given from the chair was "Lord John Russell and the House of Commons," which was drunk with much cordiality.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL returned thanks on behalf of the House of Commons.

LORD PALMERSTON, who was greeted with a loud burst of enthusiastic cheering, rose and said—My lords and gentlemen,—The Lord Mayor has been graciously pleased to permit me to propose to you a toast, which I am sure you will drink with the greatest satisfaction—I may say with enthusiasm. I beg, therefore, to give you, as the representative, not only of the female sex here assembled, but as one who adds to the splendour of the evening, "The Health of the Lady Mayoress."

The toast was drunk with great cheering.

The following toasts were afterwards given:—

"The Sheriffs of London," to which Alderman Muggidge and Mr. Sheriff Crosley responded.

"The Bar of England," to which Mr. Serjeant Shee responded.

"The Court of Aldermen, and Alderman Finnis."

"The Representatives of the City of London," to which toast Mr. Mastorinan, M.P., returned thanks.

The company separated about eleven o'clock, the greater part proceeding to the Common Council-room, which is fitted up as a ball-room, where dancing was kept up to an advanced hour.

Our Opera-Glass.

ADRIEN.—There has been no change in the performances here during the week. Mr. W. Brough's farce, "Bon-fide Travellers," has now got into capital working order. The Keeleys are irresistible, and carry the piece through amid roars of laughter. A new farce by Mark Lemon, Esq., has been read, and is now in active rehearsal, so that there is still a good hoarty laugh in store for the patrons of this ably conducted theatre.

RYDE.—An amateur performance has been given at the Theatre Royal, under the distinguished patronage of the leading families resident in Ryde and its vicinity. The performances were arranged with the view of raising a contribution to the Patriotic Fund. The efforts of the promoters of this object were crowned with success, for although the usual prices of admission were doubled on the occasion, the little theatre, before the rise of the curtain, was crowded in every part. The sum of £30 was handed over to the fund as the result. The performances consisted of Mr. Planché's comedy of "Faint Heart never won Fair Lady," and of the farce of "His First Champagne." The principal male characters were supported by Sir H. Chamberlayne, Captain Disney Roebuck, Captain Blatchford, Mr. A. Pratt Barlow, Mr. A. Arceuckne, and Mr. H. Collingwood Ibbetsou, and between the pieces the following address was delivered by Captain Roebuck. It was written for the occasion by Mr. Shirley Brooks:—

A few brief words—I need but few to tell—
What every heart before me knows too well—

Ours are no days for vaunt, and, least of all,
Vaunt we our deeds in War's grim Carnival.
Stern is the work appointed, read the blow
The Twin-Avengers deal on Europe's foe.
O, may the hallo veil swords—that leaped to light
To help the injured, and uphold the right—
Cleave the proud crest, and rend the fierce array Of him whose dark ambition stirred the fray,
And blow on blow descend, like wintry rain,
Till that scant need be left to strike again.
But leave all boast to him who dares proclaim
New victory in each chastisement and shame.

But who, without some touch of kindred fire,
Takes each brief message from yon lightning wire—
What eyes but sparkle, and what pulse but speeds,
When the broad page tells out our warrior's deeds?
How the glad wares to Kalamita bore
The glorious armament from Varna's shore.
Hark! 'tis the signal sound—the bugle's call—
And freemen march where slaves were wont to crawl.
On! Feet before them. See, where, rank on rank,
The massy phalanx hours from Alma's bank!
Then the dread rush—the fierce and deadly close—
Death's ghastly harvest reaped by grappling foes—
The Russian's frenzied rout—and Alma's name
Henceforth emblazoned on our scrolls of fame.

Noble achievement—be it nobly told
Where History lingers o'er her page of gold
But is there not some deep and sacred debt
She will not note, but we may not forget—
A debt we all are proud—yet sad—to owe
To those whose deeds have made each bosom glow.
Not the bright circlet for the hero's brow,
The silver badge—the ribboned order—now,
There's a fair Royal hant, well skilled in place
Each graceful tribute—with an added grace.
An humble duty at this hour demands
Service from all warm hearts and liberal hands.

You know the letter—scarce a week has fled
Since in each English household it was read—
That soldier's letter—written to his wife
After the day of Alma's glorious strife.
He said, 'When our grand, rushing charge was made,
I thought of you and baby, and I prayed.'
Words which tell better than aught else could do
What the brave fellows yonder ask of you.

'Tis scarce a fit occasion to present
The darkest picture from the soldier's tent.
Not on the mimic scene—I think—should come
The mourning banner and the muffled drum;
Nor needs it. Who but knows the battle story,
How Death trod close upon the steps of Glory;
How many, dying, left you this bequest—
Those who loved them, and whom they loved the best?

But not alone the widow's heart to cheer,
And not alone to dry the orphan's tear,
Be ours. 'Twere consolation, not in vain,
To him who writhes upon a couch of pain,
To know his wounds had eloquence to make
His country tend his loved ones—for their sake.

You've heard our aim. We own to little fear
Lest you should disapprove—for you are here.

On Monday last the same Amateur Company, played at the King's Rooms, Southsea, "Faint Heart," "The Wandering Minstrel," and "Box and Cox," in which the Willkins of Mr. A. Arceuckne and the Cox of Mr. Barlow elicited the most thundering applause. The return was £54.

OXFORD.—On Wednesday last Mr. Frederick Webster, professor of elocution to the Royal Academy of Music, (whose advertisements appear in our columns), delivered an interesting lecture to a numerous and respectable audience at the Town-hall, Oxford, on the "Oratory of the Senate." The talented lecturer, who visited the ancient seat of learning at the instance of the committee for conducting the city public lectures, was well received.

TURKISH MUSEUM.—We have a report in type touching this unrivalled exhibition, but the pressure of war news is so great that the Turks of Hyde Park Corner must this week cede the pas to the Turks of the Crimea.

AMERICAN THEATRICALS.—Wallack's Theatre.—Two great events came off, to use a racing phrase, during the past week at Wallack's, the manager winning cleverly on both. The first was a reproduction of a two act comedy, called "Sons and Systems." This piece was played at Madame Vestris' Olympic Theatre in London some fifteen years ago, and under the same title, Mr. Herald critic to the contrary notwithstanding. Mr. Farren and Mrs. Orger, then played the parts now played by Mr. Blake and his talented wife, and Mr. Brougham shone in the Irish-Scotchman, which he now again so ably illustrates. The comedy was excellently acted at Wallack's; Blake never appeared to greater advantage than as the irascible quick-tempered Lennox Sowerby, and Mrs. Blake admirably filled up the character of Mrs. Sweetman. The contrast between them was perfect, and so acknowledged most liberally by the audience. Brougham kept the house in a roar during the first act, by his quaint impersonation of Donald O'Macswiney, well seconded by Mr. Vincent as Root, the gardener. The young gentlemen George and Edward were entrusted to Messrs. Bland and Stewart, who did their duty satisfactorily; the ladies Blanche and Laura were played by Miss Steele and Mrs. Stephens. The latter makes a dapper and smart little cavalier, and was sufficiently piquant in the illustration. The piece was a bit, although the second act rather flagged in comparison with the first, which is redolent of broad fun. The principal notability of the week, however, was the advent of Miss Rosa Bennett, who *debut*ed in the well-known character of Lady Gay Spanker in Houricault and Co.'s animated patch-work of "London Assurance." This was presented on Thursday evening, before one of the largest and most enthusiastic audiences of the season, and with, as the bill most truthfully informed us, "an unparalleled cast." Upon first glancing over the names attached to the different characters, the only conclusion we could arrive at, was that they must have been all written on slips of paper, tossed into a hat and picked out by the actors at random. Such a subversion, topsy-turvyising and elbowing out of place! Blake, our well-beloved and recognised Sir Harcourt, figuring as Mark Middle; Wallack descending upon Dazzle, and Brougham ascending into Sir Harcourt: if the luck of the drawing had only caused Lester and Vincent to change parts, the seeming inconsistency would have been complete. We have not the slightest doubt in our mind, but that our feelings upon the subject were shared by nine-tenths of the audience, and that they gathered there in numbers curiously anxious and not unapprehensive of the effect of so unusual a distribution. With the same candour we must confess to a most brilliant disappointment. We say it, and "we say it boldly," that never in our experience have we seen the comedy played with more unity of purpose, or with a more nicely-balanced generality of excellence. But first of the fair debutante. To be brief, she took possession of the house at the end of her very first speech, and held it to the close of the performance. Spirited without being unlady-like, joyous without extravagance, it was one of the best renditions of the character we ever witnessed. The celebrated speech, the cheval de bataille of all the Lady Gays,—the description of the steeplechase, was delivered with a clear, ringing tone, and with a nicety of discrimination, to which the audience responded with cheer upon cheer, calling her before the curtain at the close of the act to receive the pleasant verdict of cordial approval. Blake's Middle was "rich" to a degree; Wallack never looked or acted better than he did as Dazzle; Lester was fully up to Charles Courtly, which he invested with unusual prominence; Vincent fitted Dolly Spanker exactly—although a little less exuberance of manner would tone him down to the standard of those by whom he is surrounded; amongst them all, however, we must confess to the greatest amount of surprise at Brougham's Sir Harcourt. That was a most artistic, and in some respects quite original conception of the roué baronet, well and carefully studied, wiggled and whiskered unimpeachably, and costumed to perfection. Mrs. Hoy was the Grace Harkaway, and her lady-like repose of style contributed greatly to the rich fund of general excellence. We begin to hunger most amazingly to see the same amount of ability in something novel. When are we to have the long-promised five-act comedy by an American gentleman? The "Brigand" is announced: that will be a red-letter day to the habitués of Wallack's. The manager will appear in his original character of Alessandro Massaroni.—Burton's Theatre.—There has been a well deserved succession of fine houses at this pleasant theatre, and all have nightly been delighted by the appearance of the two great comedians, Burton and Placide, in "Parents and Guardians" and other excellent pieces.

CANADA.—A new theatre, to be called Her Majesty's Theatre, is now in actual course of construction at Bytown, in Canada West, the probable future seat of government in the adjoining provinces. Bytown has already been a paying place for the different theatrical companies that have visited it, and now that it is arriving at the dignity of a city of consequence, there is reason to suppose that an enterprising manager would find it to his interest to keep the place open during the greater part of the year. The future lessee and part proprietor is Mr. Joseph S. Lee, a gentleman well known here in theatrical circles, and one whose claims are fully recognised in literary society throughout the British provinces. The plan adopted has been that of Burton's theatre, before the present pit was made, and it will cover the same space of ground. It is expected that it will be ready for occupation on the 1st of June next. Now that the railroad is finished from Prescott (opposite to Ogdensburg), Bytown is on the direct route from New York to Montreal and Quebec.

FASHIONABLE, DRAMATIC, AND MUSICAL SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

That eccentric operatic luminary, Mademoiselle Cruvelli, re-entered France by Strasbourg, to resume her duties at the Théâtre Impérial de l'Opéra. Consequently the new work in five acts by Scribe, and composed by Verbi, was read on Thursday the 9th inst., and will be put into rehearsal immediately, supported by Mlle. Sophie Cruvelli, Marie Dussy, M. Greyuard, Bonnehé, Ohlin, and Depassio. It is stated that the persons charged with informing the management, in due time of the unavoidable absence of Mlle.

Cruvelli failed in their mission. Mlle. Cruvelli, alarmed at the consequences, fled in dismay; but learning how much the prolongation of her absence aggravated her involuntary fault, she solicited and obtained permission to resume her duties—most interesting fact to the English, who patronise art of every country but their own.

The celebrated French comedian, Bouffé, is now performing at the Porte St. Martin, Paris, with great éclat. His health not permitting his taking a regular engagement at either of the theatres where his pieces are the speciality, he has obtained an exceptional permission from the Minister—founded on his numerous services rendered to the stage, and the morality of his répertoire—to act at any of the theatres of Paris where and when he pleases, the Minister reserving to himself the right to fix the number of the representations—an honour English actors dare not dream of.

NEWS FOR THE FRENCH RESTAURATEUR OF THE PRINCESS'S.—A new doublet, called "The Five Hundred Devils," is in active preparation at the Parisian Theatre, the Café.

ROSATI AND CERITO.—Two ballets are in preparation at the Grand Opera, for Rosati and Cerito.

A ROYAL BABY WANTED.—A report is current in the salons of Paris, that, in accordance with Spanish custom, the Empress of the French intends to make a pilgrimage in order to a fruitful issue. We should suppose that such a shrine must belong to the Saxe Coburg Gotha family.

ADELPHI.—A new domestic drama is in rehearsal at the Adelphi.

JERROLD AND KEAN.—On its being announced that Mr. Charles Kean had returned to London, Jerrold remarked, "Has he ever been away?"

FACT.—A worthy citizen of London wrote the other day to a celebrated maître d'hôtel in Paris, as follows:—"Sir, I beg you will send me my pearl-handled penknife that I left on my dressing-table in No. 23.—Yours obediently, R. M.—" At the moment of sealing his letter he found his knife. Re-opening it, he added—"P.S. You need not trouble yourself to look for the knife, as I have found it."

A MAYOR'S NEST.—A newly-elected Lord Mayor, speaking of certain articles in our vivacious friend Punch, observed: "I despise those unkind attacks. When I write an anonymous letter, I always sign my name to it."

THE WORD OF COMMAND.—A very young officer of militia gave the word of command lately to an awkward squad—"As you were last Monday."

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH, FRIDAY.

(Sittings in Banco before the full Court.)

THE QUEEN V. ALLEYNE AND OTHERS.—Mr. Edwin James was heard at great length in this case, in support of the rule to set aside the writ of error and judgment signed by the defendants, for want of joinder in assignment of errors, thereby virtually quashing the conviction upon an indictment against the defendants, tried before Lord Campbell in December, 1861, for defrauding a gentleman named Kennedy out of a sum of upwards of £7,000, upon a betting transaction, the defendant, Alexander McGeachy Alleyne, being sentenced to two years' imprisonment, and the defendant, J. Alleyne, to six months' imprisonment. The grounds urged in support of the rule being, that a corrupt compromise to defeat the ends of justice had been entered into between McGeachy Alleyne and the prosecutor, Kennedy, to put an end to the prosecution by payment of a sum of £5,300, a writ of error to issue so as to defeat the conviction. Mr. Sergeant Steele spoke on the part of the defendants.—Lord Campbell gave judgment, and in terms of the greatest severity animadverted upon the course that had been taken by the defendants to defeat the ends of justice by covert frauds upon the Court. The majesty and integrity of the law had, his lordship observed, been shamefully tampered with; and, upon the facts before the Court, they felt bound to make the rule absolute. Rule absolute accordingly. The effect of the decision will be, not only to quash the writ of error and other proceedings, but place the verdict and sentence intact; and the defendants, convicted in December, 1861, and sentenced to undergo the punishment above mentioned, liable to be apprehended upon the warrants issued for that purpose. [At the present time an indictment preferred by the defendants stands for trial, having been removed by certiorari at the sittings after the present term.]

A GAMEKEEPER CONVICTED OF POACHING.

At the recent Petty Sessions, holden at Middleton Cheney, before W. Willes, and C. T. Willes, Esq., and Rev. P. Litchfield, John Jackson, of Greatworth, near Brackley, gamekeeper to Rev. Mr. Humphreys, was summoned for trespassing in a field at Halse, in the parish of Brackley St. Peter, belonging to Mr. Edward Butterfield, in search of game.—Mr. Francillon, of Banbury, appeared for the defence.—John Stevens, of Brackley, gamekeeper to J. L. Stratton, Esq., deposed that, about four o'clock in the afternoon of Thursday, October 5th, he saw Jackson and another man named James Barton on land belonging to Mr. Butterfield in Greatworth parish; Barton had a double-barrelled gun with him. There was a ditch in the field, along which Jackson walked, while Barton went alongside, about four or five yards off. When about half way across the field, one of the pointers turned off up the field, as if it was footing or drawing after something, and Barton followed the pointer with the gun in his hand a distance of 120 yards. Barton turned and saw him coming, when he went back to Jackson. He, the witness, went to them and told them he should summon for trespassing in search of game. Jackson had a hare over his shoulder. Barton asked him to say nothing about it.—There was no other evidence for the complainant, and, for the defence, evidence was called to prove that the defendant was returning from Mr. Bartlett's farm, where he had shot the hare he had with him, and that he was merely crossing the field to make a short cut home.—George Tierney deposed that he occupied 150 acres of land at Greatworth, and had a field immediately adjoining the one in which defendant was stated to have been trespassing. Mr. Jackson was a gamekeeper, and he gave him permission to shoot over his land. James Barton (who was with Jackson at the time, and was also summoned) next deposed that he and Jackson merely crossed the field to make a short cut, and he swore positively that neither of them made any deviation to the ditch, such as the gamekeeper spoke of; nor were they beating for game in any way.—James Barton was then charged with the same offence, on the same day, in company with Jackson. They were fined £2 each, and expenses, 17s.—Another charge was then preferred against Jackson for being in search of game on the 5th of October, on land in the occupation of Mr. Roberts at Greatworth.—Mr. R. Roberts, farmer, Farthinghoe, deposed that about nine o'clock in the morning of Thursday, October 5th, he heard the report of a gun in a field over which the Rev. F. Litchfield has the right of shooting. He went to the spot and saw the defendant, in company with Edward Barton, an elder brother of the defendant in the former case. He told them they had no right to shoot there, as it belonged to Mr. Litchfield, and they went away. Both of them had a gun and two pointers. Fined £1, and 16s. 6d. costs.—The money in each case was paid.

BOW-STREET.

BETTING-HOUSE CASE.—On Tuesday, towards the close of the afternoon, the vicinity of the court became thronged with a mob of several hundred persons, who were attracted to the spot by the apprehension of 114 "sporting characters," and others, in the house of Mr. C. Morbey, of the Sun public-house, in Long-acre. In order to accommodate the defendants, the court had to be cleared of the public altogether.—

Superintendent Pearce, F Division, stated that he held in his hand a warrant, signed by the Commissioners of Police, authorising him to apprehend a number of persons assembled in a public house known as the Rising Sun, 66, Long-acre, for betting purposes. Between one and two o'clock he proceeded with his men to the house, outside of which there was a crowd of persons, including a man named Robert Ryan, who was the check-taker of the establishment, and whom witness apprehended for obstructing the way. Witness then proceeded to the first-floor front room, in which he heard a voice say, "6 to 1" on some horse. On entering the room he found ten or twelve persons seated round a table, on which there were several betting-books and a quantity of papers. Witness called out, "I am an officer, and you must consider yourselves in custody." There were seventy persons in the room. Some of the papers were caught up and thrown into the fire before he could get them. Witness sent the defendants to the police-station, where they were searched—a number of papers, betting-books, &c., being found in their possession, together with very large sums of money, chiefly in bank-notes, which were not taken from them.—Mr. Jardine: Did you distinguish those on whom large sums of money were found?—Witness could point them out.—Mr. Jardine: Did you detect any leaders in the proceeding?—Witness: The parties were admitted on payment of 6d. each, which was collected by Ryan at the door. The landlord is not present; he was not there; but one of the waiters is present. Some of the papers which had been torn up were afterwards collected, but he had not since had time to examine them.—Inspector Mitchell deposed to having gone at the same time into the back parlour of the house, where he found twenty-one persons similarly occupied. He told them to consider themselves in custody. While witness was there, the waiter (Lancaster) wanted to enter the room, but witness refused to admit him. Witness found a book of handicaps and several sporting papers on the table, besides a portfolio containing other sporting documents, lists, &c.—Mr. Jardine: Heard no observation about betting, and saw no one take a leading part.—James Marchant, F 111, was about to state that he had watched the house in plain clothes ever since the 10th of October, when Mr. Duncombe, solicitor (who attended for several of the defendants), objected to the evidence.—Mr. Jardine said, it might be necessary to show the character of the house.—The witness proceeded to state that he had seen most of the defendants present betting, paying and receiving money at Mr. Morbey's house almost daily, and he once heard Mr. Morbey, the landlord, say, "I have sold upwards of 200 tickets, and should have sold a good many more if it had not been for the —superintendent." The waiters were soliciting orders while this was going on. After some further evidence of a similar character Mr. Jardine adjourned the inquiry, on the application of Mr. Duncombe, to enable the defendants to meet the charge.—The defendants were then set at liberty, after being bound over in their own recognizances of £50 each to appear on Tuesday next.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.

THE "OATLANDS PLATE."—James Tooke was summoned before Mr. Bingham by the police, under the Betting-houses Suppression Act, charged with keeping a betting-office at 6, Great Windmill-street. A second summons against Hannah Loeber, as the occupier of the house and proprietor of the betting establishment, was also taken out.—Mr. Humphreys appeared for the defendants.—George Geddes, agent, 22, Queen-street, said, on the 11th ult. he went to 6, Great Windmill-street, to the betting-shop of Hannah Loeber, and made a bet of 5s. with the defendant James Tooke. The bet was five to one that a horse named Testy would win a particular race, the Oatlands Plate. If the horse won he was to receive 30s. for his stake. Having been informed afterwards that the horse was withdrawn from the race, he went the next day to Windmill-street, and asked to have his money back again. The defendant said, if he could give him proof that the horse had been withdrawn he would return the money. He referred the defendant to the sporting papers, in which the circumstance was mentioned. The defendant would not return the money.—Cross-examined: Had never seen Testy. Only knew there was to be a race from reading the particulars in the newspapers. Had not been at Newmarket to ascertain if such a race as the Oatlands Handicap had occurred. Had the defendant paid back the 5s. he should have said nothing more about the matter. When the defendant took the 5s. he entered the transaction in a large book.—Police-sergeant Thompson, C 2, said, he went with the witness to Windmill-street, and saw the defendant and Mrs. Loeber in the shop. The witness Geddes asked to have his 5s. back. Defendant Tooke asked witness to give him the difference of half a sovereign. He asked Tooke what he was going to give the witness 5s. for. The defendant replied he did not wish to have any more bother about the affair. He asked defendant if he did not want to give the 5s. on account of the horse Testy. The defendant replied that was his business, and he should answer no further questions.—Mr. Humphreys, for the defence, contended that no proof was given of such a race as the Oatlands having either occurred or been projected. The statements in the papers were not legal proof, and, on that ground, he claimed a nonsuit.—Mr. Bingham said he would take time to consider the point, and adjourned the case until Tuesday, when he said he had considered the point raised by Mr. Humphreys, and his opinion was that he was bound to overrule it. He thought such a point could be urged with the least advantage by the defendant, who had taken a bet of 5s. on the race, and who, throughout, treated the race as a fact. He was very glad that Mr. Humphreys was present when he dismissed the information against certain gaming-houses on Tuesday, as he would have heard his remark, that when the object of the act of Parliament was obtained—namely, the suppression of the cause of complaint—he was willing to deal with offenders leniently. In the present case, though the penalty was £100, he would be content to inflict almost a nominal fine, upon receiving an assurance that the betting-office should be closed, and having good surety tendered that such would be the case.—Mr. Humphreys agreed to the conditions, and the case was disposed of in the way suggested.

LAMBETH.

ANOTHER BETTING-HOUSE CASE.—Mr. Henry Naphthi Simmonds, a cigar-shop-keeper, at No. 2, High-street, Newington; Mr. Richard Jenkins, a picture-dealer, at No. 17, Princes-street, Soho; Mr. Edward White, of No. 6, Halford-terrace, Newington, who described himself as a clerk; and Mr. Lee Simmonds, of No. 2, High-street, Newington, merchant, were brought up on a warrant granted by Sir Richard Mayne, and charged before Mr. Elliott, the former with keeping a betting-house, and the three latter with being found at his betting-house.—Mr. Solomon attended for the defendants.—Mr. John Lund, the superintendent of the P Division of police, produced a report in writing made by him to the Commissioners of Police, and a warrant granted and signed by Sir Richard Mayne, authorising him to enter the house No. 2, High-street, Newington-butt, kept and used as a betting-house. On the preceding evening, at about a quarter to eight o'clock, he went to the house in question, accompanied by three of his sergeants, and, on entering the shop, which was kept as a tobacco and cigar shop, he saw the defendant Henry Simmonds behind the counter, and the other three defendants outside the counter, but some distance up the shop, speaking to him. Addressing the former, he said he wished to speak to him, and on his getting to the end of the counter he told him (Henry Simmonds) he held a warrant, signed by Sir Richard Mayne, to take him as well as those he found in the house into custody, on a charge of keeping a betting-house. He (Mr. Lund) then read to the party the warrant which he held, and next proceeded to search the place. In a small box fitted up at the upper end of the counter and surrounded with scarlet silk curtains, in which there was a desk and a sort of pigeon-hole, for the purpose of receiving money from outside the counter, he found three books, all relating to horseracing, and four receipts for newspaper advertisements, one of which Henry Simmonds said would appear in a morning paper on the following day, and which he (Mr. Lund) would see. On further search he found in and about the desk a slate-book, a letter, and several papers and documents relating to past and future races, with the odds on the various horses in the various races. He next proceeded up stairs, and in a drawer in the bedroom he found thirty-nine dice.—Mr. Elliott: I suppose these dice had nothing to do with horse betting? They are such, I suppose, as are used in gambling?—Mr. Lund: They are, Sir, and had nothing to do with horseracing. He (Mr. Lund) also found in this and other rooms letters and papers relating to horseracing.—In his cross-examination by Mr. Solomon,

Mr. Lund said the place was an open and public cigar-shop and tobacco-shop, and when he entered it he found the defendants together, but Mr. Henry Simmonds was on the other side of the counter. He asked Henry Simmonds if he lived there, and he replied that he did. He did not ask him whether he was the owner or occupier of the house, and had no recollection of Simmonds's telling him he was not the owner or occupier. Since his capture he noticed that the name of Rebecca Simmonds was painted over the door, but the name did not correspond with the colour or appearance of the letters in front of the shop. The desk he had described, and in which he found the betting-books, was not a common thing in a cigar-shop—on the contrary, it was quite uncommon. Respecting the dice, he did not know whether they had ever been used in play or not. The defendant, Henry Simmonds, said he had had them by him for a length of time, and had taken them for a debt.—Sergeant Quinncar, 1 P., said he accompanied his superintendent to the house of the defendant Henry Simmonds, and found there a small ledger and a memorandum-book, both relating to betting on horseracing, and in the latter were entries of 332 bets on horses made within a very short time. He also found on the person of Henry N. Simmonds £11. 10s. in gold, £1. 2s. 6d. in silver, and a check for £35. On Wednesday last he (Quinncar) was standing near to Simmonds's shop, and seeing a man named Scott come out of it, he got into conversation with and learnt from him that he had taken the odds from Simmonds to 10s. on Little Harry, and this information he communicated to his superintendent (Mr. Lund). In conclusion, Sergeant Quinncar said that on Mr. Lund speaking to Henry Simmonds in his shop about horse betting, he (Simmonds) replied "Yes, I don't deny I bet, and I should be very happy to make a bet with you now to any amount."—Sergeant Worrell, 2d P., said, on searching the defendant White, he found in his possession a betting-book, containing several bets; "Wright's Book of Handicaps," for 1854; "Ruff's Guide to the Turf," for 1854; three letters, addressed to him from Newmarket, advising what horses to back; and several receipts for telegraphic messages forwarded from Newmarket.—Mr. Lund here called the magistrate's attention to an entry in the betting-book, of Mr. Henry Simmonds on the Epsom Handicap, to which the name of Scott was attached, and which was a bet of £4 to 10s. against Little Harry for that race; and called Henry Scott, 7, Edward-street, Penton-place, and who is one of the keepers of the Surrey-gardens.—Scott, who appeared in compliance with a summons, here entered the witness-box, and, when sworn, said that, having made up his mind to put a bribe upon Little Harry for his race on the following day, he went to the house of Mr. Simmonds, 5, High-street, Newington, and, seeing Mr. Simmonds there, he asked him what the odds were on Little Harry? He replied, "Seven to one;" but he said they were eight to one. Mr. Simmonds said he would give that, and asked him to what amount he wanted it, and he replied 10s. He then gave him half a sovereign, and he saw Mr. Simmonds make an entry of the bet in his book.—Mr. Solomons: What did you say you are, Mr. Scott?—Scott: A keeper at the Surrey-gardens.—Mr. Solomons: Then, how long have you been an informer? Scott: I don't know what you mean.—Mr. Solomons: Are you not the informer in this case?—Scott (angrily): Most certainly not. When I came out of Simmonds's I met Sergeant Quinncar, whom I have known for many years, and, addressing me, he said, "I suppose you have been sporting your money," and I said "Yes, I have just put half a sovereign on Little Harry," and that's all I know about it, beyond my being summoned here to give my evidence.—Mr. Solomons: Then, I suppose you would not have told Sergeant Quinncar anything about it if you thought it would lead to this?—Scott: Certainly not. (Laughter).—This being the case on the part of the prosecution, Mr. Solomons said he had really nothing to answer, as no evidence whatever had been given to show that Mr. Henry Simmonds was the owner, occupier, or keeper of the house in question, or that he had been employed by or was acting for the owner or occupier, nor had it been shown that he was in the care or management of it.—Mr. Lund said, he was in a condition to show that Henry Simmonds was continually at the house in question, and recalled Sergeant Quinncar.—Mr. Solomons protested against further evidence being given after the case was closed.—Mr. Elliott, however, waived the objection, and Sergeant Quinncar deposed to the fact of having constantly seen Simmonds acting in the shop as its owner; and in his absence a young woman, his sister, attended to the business.—Mr. Solomons again addressed the bench, and contended that, even with this addition to the evidence, there was nothing before the Court to justify a conviction in so highly a penal act.—Mr. Elliott considered that the evidence and the whole of the circumstances required some consideration, and he should therefore defer his judgment to a future day. In the interim, he should admit the whole of the defendants to bail on their own recognizances, except Mr. Henry N. Simmonds, and he must find two sureties in £20 each, and himself in £40, to appear with the others on a future day.

FRANCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Thursday, Nov. 9.

Sebastopol—Conduct of the French Government—Patriotic Fund—Shabbiness of the English in Paris—Punch's Verses—"John Bull" and "Cousin Jonathan"—Dearness of Living—Eugène Briffault's life duel—Doctor Benech—French Criticisms; Madame Dorval.

The news from Sebastopol without being actually disheartening is far less satisfactory than was expected, and, however it may be disguised, has thrown something of gloom over all circles, including the highest, where an intense anxiety naturally prevails on the subject. The party at Compiegne, so long deferred on this account, has now probably been altogether postponed till next season. Nothing can be better than the conduct of the Government towards the relatives of those who have fallen in the Crimea. In all cases letters of condolence have been forwarded from the War Office to the bereaved families, wherever the circumstances demanded it, from the Minister, and in many cases from the Emperor's own hand; nor were these letters merely the expression of verbal sympathy, for they are invariably accompanied by kindly inquiries, and offers of assistance where it may be required, or where the slightest claim exists. This truly generous and considerate proceeding obtains golden opinions on all sides. It is gratifying to see a government coming forward to effect that in this country, which is so nobly done by private charity in wealthy England. In France, private individuals have neither the wealth, nor, I fear, the patriotic liberality to act so noble a part. Indeed it may be said that the very air of this country has the effect of dulling the charitable sympathies even of Englishmen towards their own gallant countrymen; for the subscription opened in aid of the British Patriotic Fund in this city presents a miserable exhibition. Let us hope that the English noblemen, baronets, and gentlemen of fortune who honour Paris with their residence, and who, brilliant par leur absence in the list of contributions, will shine in the glorious list of donations published in the London papers. As yet, however, their names remain in modest abeyance. What is Punch about—our doughty friend should surely take this shabby recueil-trants in hand. By the way, his noble and touching verses on the subject of the fund were read aloud to their Majesties (both of whom perfectly understand the language) by an English lady last week at St. Cloud, and had the merited honour of receiving the warm encomiums of both the Emperor and his consort.

The English, who, for some reason or other, have made themselves remarkably scarce in Paris this summer, have suddenly begun to flock hitherwards by multitudes—so much so, that the principal hotels in the Rue Rivoli and its neighbourhood are crammed to repletion. For, observe, your true-born Englishmen will never set his foot in any place without the limits of his favourite locality. The secret of this seems to be, that these are rather dearer, and "Johnny," whose weakness decidedly leans to this side, imagines it gives him a something more of importance. In the meantime "Cousin Jonathan," who is here in great force, is unquestionably "pushing us from our stools," even here. The Americans not only take the best apartments, but eat, drink, and spend twice as much money in creature comforts as any other roya-gueurs, and thence rank proportionately high in the good graces of landlords, garguons and others, who profit by them, though their arrogance, self-conceit, and filthy habits, spitting, &c., make them generally detested by all beside, particularly those who have the misfortune of being their neighbours at tables d'hôte. Private lodgings are already becoming much dearer in anticipation of next year's National Exhibition, which, added to the increase in the price of provisions, makes living in Paris one third dearer than three years ago. What will it be when the expected shoals arrive next summer?

The week's obituary announces the death of M. Eugene Briffault, who once wielded the wittiest pen in the then famous little political journal, Le Corsaire. It was ultra-liberal, with all the spite and intolerance which distinguish special professions of "liberality" of its class, and especially directed its attacks against the Duchess de Berry. For an article of more than ordinary venom M. Briffault was called out by a young Royalist officer. When the combatants were placed, Briffault's antagonist called out to him, "I could take your life if I desired it; but I will only disable the arm which writes rascally libels on an amiable princess. They fired together, and Briffault's right arm was fractured. The Editors afterwards posted a paper on the office door, with these words, "J'ai ou ne se bat plus pour Madame la Duchesse de Berry." It should be added, that this was their last impertinence against the Duchess, for she afterwards became a persecuted victim and heroine in that paper.

Among the deaths of the last few weeks, we have to regret the loss of Dr. Benech, who died at an advanced age, leaving a very large fortune, and a character for extreme originality mixed with the kindest benevolence. In the profession, he was characterised as a quack, and his practice certainly savoured of eccentricity; but a number of almost marvellous recoveries under his hands gave him a reputation which nothing could shake. This system was to attack a disease in its first stage with a vigor decidedly opposed to the Sangrado system so much in favour with French physicians. He was mostly called in in desperate cases, when other doctors had despaired, and in many of these he found the patient suffering more from the weakness and debility arising from the treatment of his brethren, and want of nourishment, than from the disease itself. Being called in to see the Duchess of C—, a lady of about thirty-three, the mother of a charming family, living in one of the palaces of the Faubourg St. Germain, he found her sinking after a protracted illness. After examining the symptoms, he threw open one of the windows looking into the garden, then sat down, wrote his prescription, and desired it to be taken, not to the apothecary, but to the maître d'hôtel. On its being read, it was found to consist of a small cup of bouillon, to be followed in an hour by a small mutton chop, not overdone, and half a glass of Bordeaux. The patient raised her languid eyes, and inquired whom it was intended for—"Who, Madam—Why, yourself." "But, doctor, in my weak state, the attempt would kill me." "Make an effort, Madam; you are sinking from starvation—want of air and starvation. Follow my advice, and you will thank me when I have the honour to see you to-morrow." The Duchess did follow his prescription, and in a week was able to take an airing in the Bois de Boulogne. This and other similar cures effected, in defiance of all medical rules, rendered him very popular, and obtained for him an immense practice, but at the same time involved him in violent disputes with the faculty, whom he attacked, without mercy, by his pen. His creed was, that while science has been making immense strides in every other branch of knowledge, the wretched old system of blistering, bleeding, and guess-work, still prevails in medical practice as it existed centuries ago. With these doctrines, which he published with the utmost boldness, it will be easily imagined that Dr. Benech, though beloved and even venerated in his own circle, was the very reverse of a favourite with his confrères. He left a fortune of more than a million of francs (40,000*l.*)

One of the modes by which the artistes in Paris are fleeced is by compelling them all to subscribe to the host of pestiferous little theatrical journals by which the town is infested, and whose very existence is unknown except to the unfortunate actors, who are at once their supporters and their victims. The late Mlle. Dorval used to relate a sharp hit once made against herself by one of these pickpockets of the press. On her returning from a professional tour, she neglected or forgot to call and renew her subscription—an imprudence which was thus admonished in the notice of her first appearance:—"Mlle. Dorval has returned to town, evidently in good health; her performance last night was distinguished by the artiste's usual cleverness; the only drawback we observe is that her memory seems to have failed her. This, however, may be but a temporary defect—nos verrous." Unnecessary to say (added Mlle. D.) that my subscription was immediately renewed with a handsome bonus, which restored me to the good graces of the writer, and the next morning found myself proclaimed "L'Artiste à la fois la plus touchante et la plus terrible du théâtre en France."

Annals.

SAFETY OF CAPTAIN COLLINSON.—LIVERPOOL.—Her Majesty's ship Enterprise, Captain Collinson, put into Port Clarence on the 23rd of August. She had met with no traces of Sir John Franklin. During the three years the Enterprise has been in the frozen sea she has lost but three men—May 15, 1853, William Driver, ship's cook; Nov. 24, 1853, William Greenaway, able seaman; June 29, 1854, William Cheeseman, private of Marines. The commander, officers, and crew, fifty-nine in number, were in excellent health.

WRECK OF THE FORERUNNER.—Telegraphic intelligence was received on Thursday, the 9th instant, of the loss of another mail packet-ship, the Forerunner, belonging to the African Steam Company, with the mails from Fernando Po of the 1st of October, having been wrecked at Loreazo Point, on the island of Madeira, on the 25th. The total number of persons on board is supposed to have been about forty or fifty, and the number lost was fourteen, including twelve of the crew. It is not known if the mails were saved. The vessel was a small one, and is insured at Lloyd's.

PLYMOUTH, Nov. 5.—The Wrangler, steam gun-boat, arrived here en route to the Black Sea. This morning a mail was put on board, and at ten a.m. she left for her destination.

GULF OF BOTHNIA.—The Commander-in-chief has caused it to be promulgated throughout the fleet that the blockade of the Russian ports in the Gulf of Bothnia was raised on the 21st of October.

SAN FRANCISCO, SEPT. 30.—I regret to have to mention that serious disputes have arisen between the captain of the Enterprise, discovery ship in the Arctic regions, and his officers. Several of the officers were under arrest. One of them, said to be first-lieutenant, had been under arrest for two years and a half, and was said to have been a great part of this time confined to his own cabin. The duties of the higher officers had for a long time been performed by the petty officers. The officers of the Rattlesnake, which arrived here from Port Clarence on the 25th of this month, were not inclined to furnish much information upon this unfortunate subject, as they felt certain that a court of inquiry will be held at the earliest possible period to investigate the whole affair. I did not hear any complaints of the conduct of the crew of the Enterprise.—Times of Nov. 10.

GENEROSITY OF BRITISH SEAMEN. By private letters received from the Behring Straits division of the Arctic Search, it appears that as soon as the intelligence had reached them of the sad fate of the noble Bellot (the only officer whose life has been sacrificed in an immediate act of duty, in the search for Sir John Franklin), the officers and crew of her Majesty's ships Plover and Rattlesnake immediately subscribed a day's pay to the "Bellot Testimonial," expressing deep regret at the calamity which had befallen him.

REPORT OF THE STAG FROM COLUMBO.—Oct. 3, spoke the bark Eliza and Charles, bound for Madras, in lat. 8° 17' N., long. 54° 52' W. Oct. 6, at 1.30, a rocket seen, bearing S.E. by compass; sent a hand to masthead; in a short time observed a blue light, backed and stood toward it; fired two rockets, sighted a boat under sail to windward, burnt a blue light and hove to; proved to be the master, chief officer, 13 hands, and passengers of the Duke of Richmond, of Dundee, 33 days from London, bound for Valparaiso, which had taken fire at 8 a.m. yesterday, and was abandoned at noon, she being in a solid sheet of flame. One boat which left the vessel at the same time not being seen, we laid to till daylight, with a good lookout at the masthead, from 5 a.m. to 8, continued as near as possible to their supposed track, but not finding the above missing boat, with second officer and four hands, filled and made sail. Not having room for the launch, scuttled her, hoisted the gig up to starboard davits, in lat. 12° 18' N., long. 25° 53' W.

WAGES AT SUNDERLAND.—All the carpenters hitherto employed on the banks of the Wear are now on strike. Many of the ship-builders that still continued to employ their men at 6s. per day, have now their yards laid in, as those carpenters off work would not allow the others to work unless the whole of the builders give the old wages, 6s. per day.

ESCAPE OF CAPT. LUCE, OF THE ARCTIC.

Liverpool.

The screw steam-ship Canadian, Captain McMaster, arrived off this port at nine o'clock on Monday morning. She left Quebec on the 14th ult., but came to an anchor the same evening, and did not take her final departure until the 15th ult. In addition to a large cargo of merchandise, the Canadian brought forty-seven passengers. Captain Luce, of the Arctic, arrived in Quebec, by the ship Cambria, which picked him and some others from the loose wreck of that unfortunate steamer. The following is the letter of Captain Luce to the agent at New York, Mr. E. K. Collins:—

"CAPTAIN LUCE TO E. K. COLLINS, ESQ.

"Dear Sir,—It has become my most painful duty to inform you of the loss of the steam-ship Arctic under my command, with many valuable lives, I fear among whom must be included your own wife, daughter, and son, with whom I took a last leave the moment the ship was going down, without myself expecting to see the light of another day to give you an account of the heart-rending scene. The Arctic sailed from Liverpool on Wednesday, September 20, at 11 a.m., with 233 passengers, and about 150 in the crew. Nothing of especial note occurred during the passage until Wednesday, the 27th, when at noon we were on the banks, in lat. 45° 45', and long. 52° W., steering west per compass.

"The weather had been foggy during the day, and generally a distance of half to three quarters of a mile could be seen, but at intervals of a few minutes a very dense fog was followed by sufficiently clear weather to see one or two miles. At noon I left the deck for the purpose of working out the position of the ship. In fifteen minutes I heard a cry of 'hard a starboard' from the officer of the deck. I rushed on deck, and had just got up when I felt a crash forward. At the same moment saw a steamer under the starboard bow, and the next moment she struck against our guards and passed astern of us. The bows of the strange vessel seemed to be literally cut or crushed off for about ten feet, and seeing that she must sink in a few minutes, and taking a hasty glance of our own ship, and believing we were comparatively uninjured, my first impulse was to endeavour to save the lives of those on board the sinking vessel.

"The boats were cleared, and the first officer and six men left with one boat, when it was found our ship was leaking fearfully. The engines were set to work, bilge injections put on, steam pumps and the four deck pumps worked by the passengers and crew, and the ship headed for land, which I judged to be about fifty miles distant. Being compelled to leave my boat with the first officer and crew to take care of themselves, several ineffectual attempts were made to check the leak by getting sails over the bow, and, finding the leak gaining on us very fast, notwithstanding all our powerful means of keeping her free, I resolved to get the boats ready, and as many ladies and children placed in them as possible, but no sooner had the attempt been made than the French and others rushed into them in spite of all opposition.

"Seeing this state of things, I ordered the boats to be veered astern by ropes, to be kept in readiness until order could be somewhat restored, when to my dismay I saw them cut the rope in the boat, and soon disappear astern in the fog. Another boat was broken down by persons rushing into her while hanging at the davits, and many were precipitated into the sea and drowned. This occurred while I had been engaged in getting the starboard guard-boat ready, and placed the second officer in charge of her, when the same fearful scene as with the first boat was being enacted, men leaping from the top of the rail down twenty feet, crushing and maiming those who were in the boat. I then gave orders to the second officer to let go and row after the ship, keeping under or near the stern, to be ready to take on board women and children as soon as the fires were out and the engines stopped. My attention was then directed to the other quarter-boat, which I found broken down but hanging by one tackle; a rush was made for her also, and some dozen or fifteen got in and cut the tackle, and were soon out of sight.

"In the meantime I found that not a seaman or carpenter was left on board, and we were without any tools to assist in building a raft, as our only hope, and the only officer left was Mr. Doran, the third officer, who aided me with the assistance of the passengers, who deserve great praise for their coolness and energy in doing all in their power up to the very last moment before the ship sunk from under us. The chief engineer, with a part of his assistants, had taken our smallest deck boat, and before the ship went down, pulled away with about fifteen persons.

"We had succeeded in getting the fore and main yard, maintop-sail, and two top gallant yards overboard, and such other small spars and materials as we could collect, when I was fully convinced that the ship must go down in a very short time, and not a moment was to be lost in getting the spars lashed together to form a raft. To do this it became necessary to get the life-boat, 'our only remaining boat,' into the water.

"This being accomplished, I gave Mr. Doran charge of the boat, taking care to keep the oars on board, to prevent them from leaving the ship, hoping still to get the most of the women and children into this boat at last. They had made considerable progress in securing the spars together, when an alarm was given that the ship was sinking, and the boat shoved off without oars or anything to help themselves with, and when the ship sank the boat had got clear, probably the eighth of a mile to leeward. In an instant, about a quarter to five p.m., the ship went down, carrying every soul on board with her.

"I soon found myself on the surface, after a brief struggling, with my own helpless child in my arms, when I again found myself impelled downwards to a great depth, and before I reached the surface a second time had nearly perished and lost the hold of my child. As I struggled to the surface of the water a most awful and heart-rending scene presented itself to my view; over 200 men, women, and children struggling together amidst pieces of wreck of every kind, calling on each other for help, and imploring Almighty God to help them. Such an appalling scene may God preserve me from witnessing again. I was in the act of trying to save my child, when a portion of the paddle-box came rushing up edgewise, just grazing my head, and falling its whole weight upon the head of my darling child. In another moment I beheld him lying lifeless in the water. I succeeded in getting him on the top of the paddle-box, in company with eleven others. One, however, soon left for another piece of the wreck, finding it could not support him.

"Others remained till they were one by one released by death. We stood in water at a temperature of forty-five degrees up to our knees, and frequently the sea broke entirely over us. We soon seemed to separate from our friends on other parts of the wreck, and passed the dreary night, each one of us expecting every hour would be our last. At last the wished-for morning came, dreary and cold, with a dense fog, not a living soul to be seen but our own party, seven now being left. In the course of the morning we saw some water casks and other things belonging to our ship, but nothing that we could get could afford us any relief.

"Our raft was steadily settling, as it absorbed more and more water. About noon, Mr. S. M. Woodruff, of New York, was relieved by death. All the others now began to suffer very severely for the want of water, except Mr. George F. Allen and myself. In that respect we were very much favoured, although we had not a drop on the raft. The day continued foggy, except just at noon, 'as near as we could judge.' We had a clear horizon for about half an hour, and nothing could be seen but water and sky.

"Night came on thick and dreary, with our minds made up that neither of us would live to see the light of another day, and very soon three more of our suffering party were relieved by death, leaving Mr. Allen, a young German, and myself. Feeling myself getting exhausted, I sat down for the first time, about eight o'clock in the evening, on a trunk, which providentially had been found on the wreck. In this way I slept a little through the night, and became somewhat refreshed. About an hour before daylight, now Friday, the 29th, we saw a vessel's light near to us, and we all three of us exerted ourselves to the utmost of our strength in hailing, until we became quite exhausted. In about a quarter of an hour the light disappeared to the east of us.

"Soon after daylight a barque hove in sight, to the NW. of us, the fog now having lighted a little, steering apparently for us, but in a short time she seemed to have changed her course, and again we were doomed to disappointment. Yet I feel in hopes that some of our fellow-sufferers may have been seen and rescued by them. Shortly after we had given up all hopes of being rescued by the barque, a ship was discovered to the east of us, steering directly for us.

"We now watched her with the most intense anxiety as she approached us, with the wind varying, causing her to change her course several points. About noon they fortunately discovered a man on the raft near them, and succeeded in saving him by the second mate jumping over the side and making a rope fast round him, by which he was got on board safely. This man proved to be a Frenchman, who was a passenger on board the steamer with which we came in collision. He immediately informed the captain that others were on pieces of the wreck, and by going aloft he saw us and three others.

"We were the first to which the boat was sent, and safely taken aboard about three p.m. The next was Mr. James Smith, of Mississippi, second-class passenger. The others saved were five of our firemen. The ship proved to be the Cambria, of and from Glasgow, bound to Montreal, Captain John Russell, who commanded the barque Jessie Stevens, and was rescued at sea by Captain Nye, of the Pacific.

"Of Captain Russell, it would be scarce possible to say enough in his praise of the kind treatment we every one of us have received from him during the time we have been on board his ship. His own comforts he has given up in every respect for our relief. The Rev. Mr. Walker and lady, and Mr. Sutherland, who were passengers on board the Cambria, have been unceasing in their endeavours to promote our comfort. To them and to all on board we shall ever owe a debt of gratitude for their unbounded kindness to us while on board the Cambria.

"From the Frenchman who was first picked up, we learned that the steamer with which we came into collision was the iron screw-steamer Vesta, from St. Pierre, Newfoundland, bound and belonging to Oranville, France. As near as I could learn, the Vesta was steering ESE, crossing our course two points, with all sail set, wind W. by S.

"Her anchor-stock, of iron, about 7 inches by 4 inches square, was driven through the bows of the Arctic, about 18 inches above the water-line; and an immense hole had been made, most likely at the same instant, by the fluke of the anchor, two feet below the water-line, raking fore and aft the planks, and finally breaking the shank, leaving the stock remaining in and through the sides of the Arctic; and it is not unlikely, that, as so much of her bows had been crushed in, some of the heavy longitudinal pieces of iron running through the ship may have been driven through our sides—causing the loss of our ship and, I fear, hundreds of most valuable lives.

"Saturday Morning, seven o'clock, 14th. — We have safely arrived in Quebec, and I am left without a penny in the world to help myself with, or anything but sincere gratitude to repay those from whom I have received such unbounded kindness since I have been so providentially thrown among them, and with whom I am now about to separate to go to my home of sorrow.

"I learnt from the doctor at quarantine, last evening, that the Vesta had reached St. John's, with some persons from the Arctic, but he could not learn the particulars. As soon as I can get on shore I shall make arrangements to leave for New York with the least possible delay, and am to take the steamer for Montreal this afternoon. — I am, dear Sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant, "JAMES C. LUCE.

"Quebec, Oct. 14, 1854."

The passengers saved by the Huron had arrived at Quebec, and had tendered a letter of thanks to the captain for the kind treatment they received on board.

Nothing further had been heard at St. John's, N.B., of the additional boats of the Arctic steamer. The St. John's Times says it learned from the purser of the ill-fated ship that there was every hope for the safety of the lifeboats, in which a number of the passengers escaped from the sinking ship. One of these boats contained several females, and was in charge of a scientific and experienced seaman, whose management it was expected would succeed in baffling the waves. They had on board a supply of provisions which might sustain existence till rescued from their unhappy situation.

LODGE OF FIDELITY, No. 3.—This lodge called the Brethren together, for the second time this season, at the Freemasons' Tavern, on Wednesday last; but as there was no lodge business of importance, our notice must necessarily be brief. We have, however, to record a beautiful fact in connexion with this lodge, a proposition being made by Br. P. M. Williams, and second by Br. P. M. Dearsley, that a subscription should be opened for the widows and children of our soldiers in the East, which was admirably responded to by the Brethren present, the sum of £20 being subscribed. The after-evening's pleasures were much enhanced by the vocal exertions of Br. Beckett Br. G. F. Taylor (who presided at the pianoforte), and Miss Marian Taylor. The visitors were Br. George Biggs, G.S.B., and Br. Howe, G. P. D. C. for Surrey.

LODGE OF JOPE, No. 223.—The second monthly meeting this season took place on Monday last. The W. M. Brother Jones, with his usual ability, performed the ceremonies of passing Brothers Ducker and Wade, and initiating two candidates into the order, viz. Messrs. H. Isaacs and M. Cohen; prior to closing the lodge, it was proposed and carried unanimously, that the initiation fee should be raised, and the lodge dues increased, after which the Brethren adjourned to refreshment, the comforts of the Brethren being kindly attended to by Brothers Gabriel and Albert. The usual loyal and masonic toasts being given, the W.M. proposed "Prosperity to the Benevolent Fund," and mentioned that he was happy to see again amongst them one of its Vice-Presidents, Brother Henry Levy, who had just returned from America. Brother Levy returned thanks on behalf of the president and committee of that fund. The W.M. then proposed to the lodge, the health of Brother Wade. It was travelling out of the usual course, he admitted, and only warranted under very peculiar circumstances. Brother Wade was about to quit this country for Australia. He would call upon the lodge to drink his health, wishing him a safe and speedy voyage. The health of the visitors was proposed, which was responded to by Brother P.M. Abrams, of 216, in an admirable speech. Brother Henry Lyons, S.W., mentioned in the course of the evening the notice this paper had taken of Brethren leaving the lodge in a manner anything but complimentary to the Master. He called attention to this, which was taken in good part, and promised amendment for the future. The health of the W.M. was proposed by Brother Henry Levy, and responded to in the Master's usual excellent style. The health of the P. M. S. was acknowledged by Brother P. M. Self. Brother Henry Lyons and Brother Rich respectively returned thanks for their health being proposed, as the senior and junior wardens. Brother Lyons took the opportunity, with his proverbial good feeling and kindness, to call the attention of the Brethren to the announcement of Brother G. F. Taylor's Friendly Concert, for the 27th of the month. The Brethren separated at an early hour, after some excellent harmony. The visiting Brothers of the lodge were Brother J. Abraham, P.M. 218, Brother de Frece, 247, Brother Pyke, 218, Brother Rapbach, 2478, and Brother Boam, 247.

ROBERT BURNS, No. 25.—This very numerous lodge held its usual monthly meeting on Monday last at the Freemasons' Tavern; Br. Sanders was passed to the second degree, having been initiated some years before, and having no opportunity of taking this degree earlier in consequence of being some years absent from England. Br. Langley, the worthy host of the "George," Brewer-street, and Mrs. Gladwin and Caulcher, were also passed. Brs. J. L. and R. L. Stevens received the sublime degree of Master Mason. Other matters of business being transacted, the Brethren sat down to an excellent banquet—to enter upon the merits of which would now be superfluous, the proprietor's arrangements of such matters being so well known. During the evening, Br. W. Watson, in proposing a toast, mentioned a circumstance peculiarly interesting to masons: it was in allusion to a letter of a private soldier's from the Crimea, in which he states, that after the battle of the Alma he met with a wounded Russian, who appeared to be suffering so greatly that he made signs for the soldier to dispatch him, instead of which, however, he gave him water, and endeavoured to assuage his pain. There is no doubt that the Russian was a Freemason, who by certain signs endeavoured to make it known. The soldier, not being a mason, misconstrued the sign—nevertheless he acted the part of the good Samaritan. Masons will understand this. The usual toasts of the W. M., P. M.'s, Visitors, &c. being given, "Prosperity to the Masonic Charities" was proposed, and responded to in an excellent speech by Br. Neate (steward of the female school), and who hoped in 1855 to find some other Brother, as a steward, responding to the toast. The visitors were, Mrs. Cogan, No. 12; Ellis, No. 15; Molese, No. 201; Masters, No. 805; P. M. and H. Raymont, No. 118. There were also present nine Past Masters of this lodge, viz., Brs. Apter, Goring, Watson, C. Fox, Charker, Tomblison, Robinson, Temple, and W. J. Newton (secretary). The contributors to the harmony of the evening were Mrs. Adams, the W. M. Br. Paterson, W. Fielding, (who sang Perring's charming ballad of "Have faith in one another" most delightfully), and G. F. Taylor, who presided at the pianoforte.

ENOCH LODGE, No. 11.—Br. Ledger, W. M. This lodge called a meeting of its members for the first time this season, on Wednesday last, when upwards of sixty Brethren were present. The lodge business being merely of a formal character, the Brethren at an early hour sat down to a most recherche banquet, at which the W. M. presided most efficiently. An admirable corps of vocalists were present, viz. Brs. Donald King, Lawler, Leffler, Day, G. F. Taylor, and Mrs. Marian Taylor, whose charming vocalization obtained for her encores in all her songs; in fact, the musical arrangements upon this occasion were of a superior order, and deserved the reception they met with.

ST. JOHN'S LODGE OF INSTRUCTION, HAMSTEAD, 25th of OCTOBER.—At a weekly meeting of the St. John's Lodge of Instruction held this evening, Brother P. M., W. Shury, W. M. The Secretary read a letter from Brother W. M. Bywater, P. M., No. 10, enclosing a post-office order for £2 15. 6d. subscribed by the Percy Lodge of Instruction, No. 224, towards a Testimonial to Brother Adams; and it having been intimated to this lodge on several occasions, that many Brethren and Lodges of Instruction generally, had expressed a strong desire to become subscribers to the Testimonial, it was moved by Brother P. M., W. Paxon, and seconded by Brother P. M. H. Paxon, "That the best thanks of this Lodge of Instruction be presented to the Brethren of the Percy Lodge of Instruction for their kind co-operation, and in order that the Lodges of Instructions generally, as well as individual Brethren, may have an opportunity of testifying their respect for Brother Adams, by subscribing to a Testimonial to be presented to him, that they be invited to join in a General Testimonial for that purpose, and that all subscriptions be forwarded to Brother Aldrich, of Hampstead, S. W., St. John's Lodge, No. 196, and Honorary Secretary to this Lodge of Instruction, or to Brother Hazard of Hampstead, J. W., and Treasurer of the St. John's Lodge, No. 196, and Treasurer of this Lodge of Instruction." It was moved by Brother Cornick, and seconded by the W. M., "That the subscription list be open till the 29th of November next, after which date no further subscriptions be received, and that a subsequent meeting of the subscribers be convened to determine as to what the testimonial shall consist of."

POLISH NATIONAL LODGE, No. 778, AND OLD CONCORD, No. 201.—Notices of these lodges next week.

ERRATUM.—Hon Accord Mark Lodge. In our notice of the installation last week, for James Tucker, P. G. M. for Dorsetshire, read William Tucker, P. G. M.

GEORGE AND BLUE BOAR, HIGH HOLBORN.—Mr. G. F. Taylor intends holding, for his Benefit, a Madrigal and Glee Concert, of a convivial character, among gentlemen only, at the above Tavern, on the evening of Monday, November the 27th, to commence at eight o'clock precisely. Tickets, two-shillings and sixpence each, to be had of Mr. G. Taylor, 21, Robert Street, Hampstead Road; at the Freemasons' Tavern; and at the George and Blue Boar, Holborn.

BOARD OF BENEVOLENCE.—At the monthly meeting of the Board of Benevolence, held at Freemasons' Hall, on Thursday, Oct. 26, nine applicants were relieved with various sums amounting in the aggregate to £85. 17s.

ROYAL FREEMASONS' GIBLS' SCHOOL.

On the 12th ult., the usual Quarterly Court of the Governors of the Girls' School was held at the Freemasons' Tavern, Great Queen-street, for the election of children, and for the transaction of general business. Brother Mills occupied the chair.

Brother Crewe, the Secretary, read the minutes of the previous quarterly court, and of the several sittings of the House Committee, which had taken place during the three months intervening. From these records it appeared that the Grand Lodge has this year subscribed £350 to the funds of the Institution. All the children, with the exception of twelve, spent the last vacation with their relatives and friends, and returned to the school in good health. One child unfortunately fell a victim to the late pestilence, notwithstanding the most attentive care of the medical officers and of the schoolmistress. The conduct of Dr. Moore, M.D., Honorary Physician, the same gentleman who, some time since, filled the office of G.S.D., was beyond all praise. During the time that the child's illness continued, he attended her at Wandsworth, several times each day, and supplied her with wine and other necessities from his own establishment. The House Committee fully recognising such an active exercise of the highest virtue that can adorn a Mason, had placed on record the expression of their unanimous thanks to Brother Moore. Brother Howell, surgeon to the Institution, was also indefatigable in his exertions, and was in constant attendance on the child, while the care bestowed on the youthful sufferer, by Miss Jarwood, was characterised by all that fond attention which she has for so many years exercised towards the children placed under her care; and the relatives of the child, in most affecting terms expressed their gratitude for the careful and affectionate manner with which she had been treated.

The committee had defeated an attempt made by the churchwardens to subject the Institution to an annual charge of £1. 7s. 6d. for church rates, and received a letter from Brother Philip Hardwicke, their architect, certifying, that the works at the School House had been completed to his satisfaction.

These minutes were, on the motion of Brother Symonds, confirmed by the Court.

The Treasurer was then authorised to pay £393. 5s. 8d., the expenses of the Institution for the quarter.

Brother Crewe then announced that there were six vacancies on the school, and that there were only five approved candidates: on which it was moved, that the five children so approved should be admitted without a poll. This was at once agreed to.

Brother Symonds next brought before the Court, the case of a child who had been elected at the poll, which took place in April last, but who, on account of the extreme delicacy of her constitution was refused the necessary medical certificate to qualify her admission. She had since been residing at Margate, and was now greatly improved in health, as testified by letters from medical men resident in that town, addressed to Brother Patton. Under these circumstances, he thought that the unfilled vacancy should be kept open for her, subject to her obtaining a certificate of good health from the medical officers of the charity; and he had great pleasure in moving a resolution to that effect.

Brother Barrett seconded the proposition.

The Chairman thought that the child's illness did not nullify her election, but that she had a right to the first vacancy which might arise after her complete recovery.

There being some doubt on this point, the motion was put from the chair, and unanimously agreed to.

The proceedings then terminated with a vote of thanks to the Chairman.

At a meeting of the General Committee on Thursday last, over which Br. Beadon presided, Miss Jarwood was appointed Matron, pro tem, in the place of the late Mrs. Crooks.

[From the Masonic Mirror.]

CELEBRATION OF ST. JOHN'S FESTIVAL, AT ADELAIDE.—On the evening of the 22nd of June, the Brethren of the Lodge of Unity, and those of the Adelaide St. John's Lodge, met at Brother John Smith's, Port Adelaide, to celebrate the festival of St. John. About fifty-three Brethren set down to supper. The usual Masonic toasts were proposed and duly honoured. At twelve o'clock the Acting-Worshipful Master, Brother P. M. French, left the chair, and the Brethren retired, having spent a most agreeable Masonic evening.

NEW MASONIC HALL, AT ADELAIDE.—A meeting of the shareholders of the "Masonic Hall Association," took place on Monday evening, June 5, at the Lodge-room, North-terrace. The meeting was called to adopt a deed of settlement, to elect directors, trustees, and auditors.

The chairman, Mr. J. Lazar explained the nature of the business, and the position in which matters stood. He also congratulated the shareholders upon the success of the undertaking. A ballot for the officers then took place, the result of which was the return of the following gentlemen.—Directors, J. Lazar, Esq., R. McClure, Esq., E. Mitchell, Esq., F. Haire, Esq., and A. Abraham, Esq.; Trustees, L. Joseph, Esq., Dr. Gosse, J. S. Henry, Esq., C. S. Porle, Esq., and B. Nathan, Esq.; Auditors, Messrs. Ball and Woods. There is a neat cottage attached to the hall, which is intended for the residence of Brother J. Wing, the tyler, who on this occasion was presented with a very handsome silver watch. About eighty brethren were present, and the evening was spent most agreeably.

NEW FREEMASONS' HALL, AT HOBART TOWN.—A new Masonic hall is also to be erected in this place, Brother William Champion having kindly given a very eligible site. The result is, that a company is in process of formation, with £5,000 capital, in £10 shares, to erect a hall; these shares are to be held by and transferable to those only who are true and faithful brothers amongst us. One pound is to be paid down, and the remainder is reserved in equal instalments by promissory notes, payable at three, six, nine, and twelve months, respectively, bearing date July 1, 1854. Brothers G. Sterenson, M. Kennett, and W. G. Hardy, are respectively treasurer, secretary, and solicitor. A provisional committee, has been appointed, consisting of twelve Brethren, and 264 shares have already been taken. As soon as 400 shares are taken, it is intended to hold a general meeting of shareholders for the election of officers, and the formal inauguration of the company.

THE HISTORY OF FREEMASONRY.

Among the kings were Alfred the Great, Edward the Confessor, Edward III., Henry VII., James I., during whose reign Inigo Jones planned the Banqueting House, Whitehall; and the stately gallery of Somerset House, fronting the Thames; but the architect was prevented from finishing his work by the civil wars, in which King Charles I. was beheaded, at his own window, on the 30th of January, 1649.

Sir Christopher Wren was deputy grand master when the great fire in London, in 1666, consumed so many houses, prisons, halls, gates, and churches. The greater portion of Sir Christopher's life was taken up in rebuilding many of the churches, and in erecting upon the place where the fire began the voluted column or monument, 202 feet in height, which took six years in building, in consequence of the great scarcity of stone. Amongst the most conspicuous works are St. Paul's, as it now stands, Winchester Palace, the hospitals of Greenwich and Chelsea, the theatre at Oxford, and upwards of fifty churches. Notwithstanding the extraordinary merit of this man, he was turned out of his office of Surveyor-general in his old age to make room for an ardent blockhead, who was soon after dismissed for incapacity; meantime as Pope emphatically remarks:—

"The ill-regulated Wren Descends with sorrow to the grave."

Foreign states were always jealous of freemasonry—Germany, Italy, Flanders, and Holland, having at one time united in suppressing the order. France followed the example of Holland, though many of the greatest men of the kingdom endeavoured to defend the lodge.

The persecutions at Vienna, occasioned by the jealousy of the ladies of that court, who were baffled in their devices to get some of their tools and agents into the lodges, rose to a great pitch, until his imperial Majesty pacified the empress and her satellites. The court of Rome also poured its bulls and decrees against Masons. Pope Clement issued declarations of damnation, excommunication, and interdiction, against the brotherhood, threatening them with the indignation of the Almighty and of the blessed apostles, Peter and Paul; and these declarations were posted on the gates of the palace of the sacred office of the Prince of the Apostles by the curators of the Holy Inquisition.

Our Letter-Box.

FEBRETS.

SIR,—Noticing a reply in your last week's correspondence from "Busiens," upon the subject of ferret-keeping, might I suggest the following plan, which I have adopted now for some time, and with success.

Cleanliness, warmth, plenty of straw, and a certain portion of ventilation, are the primary points in breeding and rearing ferrets. At an early age the keeper may be doomed to much disappointment; for they are mostly subjected to a disease termed "sweat," or distemper, and which in many cases proves exceedingly destructive; even with great attention I have been unable to prevent it: yet, with care, it might be, I have no doubt, greatly diminished.

I have this year three good litters of seven, ten, and eight; and out of that number I have lost but four. With me it is a rule—and one that I would advise all ferret-keepers to adopt—never to disturb the nest for at least the four first weeks; as the mother will often—as in the case of the rabbit—kill its young. Besides which, they are so tender as not to bear any kind of handling. A small quantity of clean straw, dry, placed in the front of the breeding-box, will enable the mother to furnish her own nest.

At the age of six to seven weeks they are mostly attacked with the disease I have alluded to: it is a natural one with them when at that age; and, when once amongst them, the keeper must be content with those that luck will have left him.

For food—I would recommend their being fed twice a day on bread and milk—I am not particular as to its being warm; a few birds (which often prove troublesome to the gardener), such as sparrows, linnets, &c., are good dainties twice or three times a week. The litters of hares and rabbits are greedily devoured by them; and even when at a very young age, you can easily perceive the strongest of the party as they savagely seize the piece one from the other.

I have a small brick and tile shed for them, and a sloping floor to a drain, which carries away all the moisture. They require a change of bedding once a week. When at the age of four months, I remove the parturients, and allow the mothers and their families the run of the shed: I find it preferable to removing them from the mothers. A few battles at feeding time will soon restore them to harmony.

I have breeds both of the pole-cat and white. The former I consider the easiest reared, and prove the best rabblers; the white, which are mostly speaking much smaller, serve for rats. I run them with a cord collar, to which is attached a small steel swivel—a plan which I adopt in preference to a muzzle. A very limited allowance of food on the day previous to their hunting will incline them both to hunt better and truer. I remember the letters last year to which your correspondent "Rusticus" alludes, and for one can bear testimony to the useful hints he gave to THE FIELD.

October 30, 1854.

Yours truly, T. F.

INTERPRETERS IN THE EAST.

SIR,—Having frequently noticed that THE FULCRON has pointed out the extraordinary fact that Turkish is not taught in England, I send you the following clipping from the Daily News of the 3rd inst. (Friday):—

"A SPEE ON THE STAFF.—The Malta Times of the 21th ult., states, from the Crimea, that the principal dragoman (a Greek) of Lord Raglan has been detected in sending to Russia information of the proceedings of the allied armies, and has been sent to Constantinople to be tried. It will be remembered that in letters from the Crimea, after the battle of the Alma, it was stated that full particulars of the strength and distribution of the English forces were found in Prince Menschikoff's carriage."

Now, Sir, it seems probable the war will last ten years. Why not commence teaching Turkish at once at King's College (Strand); Arabic is of little use. Come what may, we must soon employ Englishmen only as interpreters. It is no use trusting to Greeks, or other foreigners.—Yours, &c. R. L. L.

Post Office London Directory.

The "Post Office London Directory" for 1855 has just been published. The present volume is considerably increased in size, owing to the constant increase of the population in the area previously comprised, and to the fact that, as the suburbs are gradually becoming the places of residence of those engaged in business in the metropolis, it is rendered necessary to continually enlarge the area chronicled in the "Directory." An improvement is noticeable in the adoption of Messrs. Schlesinger's index to the map. The use of the coloured edges is continued, with the names of the different divisions, which enables every one to determine not only the beginning, but also the termination of, each division of the work, and has, therefore, great advantages over various other plans for which patents have been taken out, which merely determine the commencement of each part, and some of which require notches to be cut, rendering the leaves liable to be torn when turned over rapidly. The official index, pp. 3 to 33, has been much enlarged by adding to each name not only the office but the department—thus to Bokenham, William, will be found appended the description, General Post-office, circulation department. All the information has been brought down to the latest period; for instance, the Royal Commission of the Patriotic Fund, which was first gazetted October 13th, will be found at p. 66 (corrected by the erasure of the name of Sir Byam Martin, whose death was announced on the 23rd ult.), and with a list of the officers. The alterations caused by the death of Lord Dunlany, an Irish representative peer, announced on the 23rd, will be found at pp. 2,267, 2,232, 2,258, and 2,260. Viscount Dunbar, elected on the 23rd, M.P. for Frome, will be found so described at pp. 2,242 and 2,252, and the death of Mr. Henry Stuart, the late M.P. for Bedford, announced in the Times of the 30th, will be found mentioned in the "Too Late Names," at p. xi. We mention these as being names of note, but equal care seems to have been taken with the entire work, as may be ascertained by referring to the name of any person who has removed or commenced business within the last three months. The proprietors may well lay claim to some merit on the score of punctuality, as well as of accuracy. Their arrangements are so made that the printing shall always be completed, so that the early bound copies of the work may be delivered to the press on the 1st or 2nd of Nov., and that the many thousands required by the mercantile public may be furnished in the succeeding week, and for several years they have not varied twenty-four hours in the completion of their task. Messrs. Kelly deserve a rapid and extensive sale for their "Post Office London Directory." We have been ourselves so accustomed to the work, that it has become to us not a mere convenience, but a downright necessity; and we hope it may yet annually see the light for a thousand and one years, much to the benefit of Britons yet unborn.

The Harwich Almanack and Tradesmen's Advertiser for 1855.

That the "Harwich Almanack for 1855" may not be undeserving of even greater success than its predecessor, both as an advertising medium as well as for general information, the proprietor, Mr. James Smith, purposes to give a historical record of the principal events affecting the town which have recently transpired, and which will be illustrated with engravings. It will thus be found worthy of preservation, and obtain a large issue both in Harwich and the neighbouring towns.

The Sporting Review. Rogerson and Tuxford, 246, Strand.

The November number lacks nothing of the interest or merit attached to so many of its predecessors. In addition to the able contributions of Scribble, Cecil, Druid, and others, we have some very amusing anecdotes in the shape of "Recollections of the late Sam Chifney," by Zingane. The embellishments—"Keep Quiet," and "The Knight of St. George"—possess a freshness that cannot fail to please. The victorious "Knight" looks full of fire from the masterly touch of Harry Hall, and the attitude of Bashmi patting the neck of his steed is sensibly a relief from the stiff and grim position in which painters too frequently perch the jockeys on the backs of their turf celebrities. The "Sporting Review" takes high rank among the magazines of the day, and must be a general favourite with sportsmen of all denominations.

History of the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella the Catholic of Spain, By WILLIAM H. PRESCOTT. Two vols. Routledge and Co.

The high estimation in which this work is held by the reading public of England is shown by the fact of its having gone through three editions since it was first published in 1837. The reprint now before us is one of those neat and reasonably-priced publications issued by Messrs. Routledge and Co., without abridgment, in a convenient form. These enterprising publishers inform us that in their system of publishing the best works of the best authors in their series of cheap volumes, they are enabled in consequence of the final decision of the House of Lords, on the question of foreign copyright, to present the public with editions of Mr. Prescott's "Ferdinand and Isabella," and also of the same author's "Conquest of Mexico," and his "Conquest of Peru." The two last-named works are intended to be issued forthwith. Every care is taken by them to secure accuracy in these editions, and the public will thus be furnished with correct as well as elegant editions of the works of this eminent American historian, at prices which will ensure their extensive circulation.

The Watering-places of England considered with Reference to their Medical Topography. By EDWIN LEE, J. Churchill.

This volume, though of small dimensions, is full of useful information, and it has now reached its third edition. In this edition considerable additions have been made relative to medical topography, and it is enlivened with short descriptive extracts from local publications. In compiling this work the author's design was to indicate the remedial advantages possessed by the different watering-places in England, and to point out the curative qualities of the various mineral springs which exist in this country. On these points his views are well considered and just, and his work contains important information respecting the sanitary effects of these mineral springs, and the benefits, in a medical point of view, to be derived from residence in the English watering-places. He describes with discrimination the complaints that are likely to be alleviated by such residence, and brings together a collection of facts and reasoning which must prove of the highest utility to all who resort to those abodes of recreation. One great advantage of the work is its concise form; and it may truly be said that it conveys a very large amount of accurate intelligence in a very little compass.

Arvon; or, the Trials. A Legend. By C. MITCHELL CHARLES, Author of "Hamon and Catar; or, the Two Races." In 2 vols. G. Routledge and Co.

In his highly-imaginative romance of Hamon and Catar, Mr. Charles has acquired a reputation in one of the higher walks of literature, which his present production every way sustains. Legendary story has evidently powerful attractions for him, and his taste has been well formed, upon the most approved models. The scene is laid in Brittany, in the middle of the fourteenth century, and the romantic and stirring incidents upon which the tale is founded arise out of the contest for the dukedom of Brittany, which at that time was being carried on between Charles of Blois and the Earl de Montfort. Into this historical fabric the siege of Nantes enters, and the author displays much skill in availing himself of it to invest his tale with the greatest interest. The force, brilliancy, and imaginative power of his style are conspicuous through all parts of the book, and we confidently venture to promise a rich treat to all novel readers disposed to enter upon its perusal.

Punch's Pocket Book for 1855. With Illustrations by John Leech and John Tenniel.

How anybody can be found bold enough to desecrate this gem of pocket books by the insertion of every-day memoranda and petty cash accounts, we know not, but should such individuals exist, at the end of the year they can scarcely congratulate themselves upon having added anything to its literary merits. The "Pocket Book" for 1855 is perhaps better than any of its predecessors, and this is saying a great deal. Leech's "Baby Show" is admirable, and Tenniel's headings are full of quaint propriety. In the literary department, where all is so good, it is hard to select any one article for special praise; fun, point, and moral go hand-in-hand, nor does Punch, in this his little annual, forget to hit "folly as it flies."

Lectures in Connection with the Educational Exhibition of the Society of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce. G. Routledge and Co.

The Society of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce has always aimed at the promotion of education, and rendered great service in this cause before the educational societies now flourishing were in existence. Being this year in its one hundredth session, the society was desirous that the celebration of that event should be marked by some prominent measures, indicating its settled conviction that it is to an improved education of all classes that the nation must principally look for a progressive improvement in its arts, manufactures, and commerce. In May, 1852, under the presidency of the Marquis of Lansdowne, K.G., it was resolved, on the motion of Earl Granville, that the society should offer to receive into union the Literary and Scientific Institutions, Philosophical Societies, Athenæums, and Mechanics' Institutes which are established in all parts of the United Kingdom. Three hundred and sixty-eight of these bodies have already been taken into the union; and, at the conference of their representatives, in June, 1853, the council was particularly invited, and undertook to hold an Educational Exhibition, at the opening of the next conference, in the present year.

Such was the origin of the Educational Exhibition which has just been held by the Society of Arts, at St. Martin's Hall.

The council of the society was desirous that the exhibition should be complete and instructive; and it was regarded as very important to exhibit, as far as possible, a representation of the means of education in France, Prussia, Belgium, Hanover, the German States, Holland, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Switzerland, and the United States of America, as well as in the United Kingdom and the colonies. The council applied to the Foreign and Colonial Departments of her Majesty's Government, who most readily assisted in making known the object the society had in view, and in commending it to the best consideration of foreign states and the governments of colonies. The Treasury granted the privilege of admission, duty free, for all articles sent for exhibition and not for sale. Most heartily was the invitation of the society responded to both at home and abroad, and the exhibition (the first of the kind ever formed in any country) has been regarded by all concerned or interested in education as most successful.

In connection with this exhibition, the council organised a series of lectures on subjects relating to education. The assistance of individuals, eminent for their talents and zeal in the cause, was sought and obtained, and every lecturer gave his services gratuitously. During the period that the exhibition was open, lectures were delivered once, and very frequently twice, a day. Many of these lectures were delivered either from scanty notes or none at all, and it is to be regretted that no record of them remains. The present volume contains such as the authors had either previously written or have subsequently prepared from their notes, and have kindly and generously placed at the disposal of the publishers.

The Home Book of Household Economy. G. Routledge & Co.

We cordially recommend this little treasury of domestic hints to the hundreds of young married ladies unskilled in household affairs, who, anxious to appear good housekeepers, are ashamed to betray their ignorance to their domestics; and who will not be unwilling to acquire from the experience of others some knowledge of that useful art of management which, carefully put in practice, is one of the great means of rendering homes happy and prosperous.

This little volume contains valuable information upon servants, hospitality, furniture; the laundry, the cook, cooking for the poor; receipts for cleaning, pickling, preserving; home-brewing of ales, wines, liqueurs, sauces, &c.; cooking receipts, management of poultry, miscellaneous receipts; and last, not least, sick-room management and cookery.

Travels of an Arab Merchant in Soulan. By Bayle St. John. Chapman and Hall.

This is an abridgement of Dr. Porron's French version of the Arabic narrative, by Sheikh Mohammed of Tunis, descriptive of his journey in two of the most remarkable black kingdoms of Central Africa—Darfur and Wadai. This work contains much that is interesting, fresh and peculiar views of manners, many good stories and characteristic anecdotes, and bears witness to its own authenticity. Mr. B. St. John has reduced it to a popular form without losing any of its value. The work is well printed, and produced in a manner to support the character of the firm from which it emanates.

Pigeons and Rabbits. By E. S. Delemer; G. Routledge & Co.

Another of the books for the country, with capital illustrations by Harrison Weir, and containing every information relative to the breeding and proper management of pigeons and rabbits.

Totals....	42,265,776		110,788,974 16

Mr. McCulloch estimates the consumption, as follows, viz:—

Consumed by man:—	Qrs.	Total Qrs.
Wheat	13,500,000
Oats, rye, and muslin (a mixture of rye and wheat)	10,650,000
Barley for malting, food, &c.	6,000,000
Beans and peas as meal	700,000	32,850,000
Consumed by the lower animals:—
Corn (principally oats) used in the feeding of horses and other animals, in distillation, manufactures, &c.	16,350,000
Total consumed by man and the lower animals, &c.	49,200,000
It is to be seen from the former estimate that the corn produced in the United Kingdom applicable to consumption
Amounts to only	42,265,776
But to this has to be added:—
Foreign corn annually entered for consumption at an average of the seven years ending with 1852; viz:—
Wheat and wheat flour	Qrs. 4,231,185
Barley	870,786
Oats and oatmeal	1,182,546
Rye	20,510
Peas and beans	665,750
	6,929,780
Consumption	49,195,596

We believe that these estimates are very nearly accurate; but, perhaps, the breadth of land under wheat, and its production, are a little overrated.

POULTRY.

HATCHING AND FEEDING OF CHICKENS.

I am aware that these recommendations to leave natural operations to nature are contrary to what are frequently found in books, but I am merely writing the results of my own experience, and I have always found the more the hatching-bens are meddled with, the worse the result. It is a notorious fact, that when a hen steals a nest in some copse or place where she can remain unmolested, she almost invariably brings forth a more numerous and stronger brood than when she sits in the hen-house. The chickens require neither food nor drink on the day on which they are hatched; in fact, both are injurious, as they interfere with the natural digestion of the yolk, which is absorbed into the bowels at the period of hatching, and constitutes the first food. If grits, oatmeal, &c., are spread before the hen on the twenty-first day, she is induced to leave the nest, and the last-hatched chickens, which are perhaps not yet dried, are unable to follow, and being weakly, perish; or unhatched eggs may be left. If undisturbed, the hen seldom leaves the nest on the twenty-first day, and on the twenty second the chicken will be found strong enough to follow her, and any unhatched eggs may be destroyed, for those chickens that are not then able to follow her will seldom be found to repay the trouble that may be taken with them. The plan of cramming pepper-corns and other spices down the throats of chickens is cruel in the extreme, and, moreover, exceedingly injurious. I have found the best food to be two-thirds sweet coarse oatmeal and one-third barley-meal, mixed into a crumbly paste with water; this is very much relished, and the chickens make surprising progress upon it; they are also very fond of a little cold oatmeal porridge, and, by way of variety, I sometimes give them a few scalded grits, dusted over with a little barley-meal, to cause them to separate. Milk is frequently used to mix the barley or oatmeal, but from the extent to which it is then exposed to the air it soon becomes sour in summer, and is injurious if employed in that state; no more food, therefore, should be mixed with milk than can be eaten in a couple of hours. Sopped bread is by no means desirable, the chickens become weakly and affected with diarrhoea from its use; in fact, it has not that degree of solidity which is requisite to afford an opportunity for the exercise of the natural grinding action of the gizzard. A little chopped onion, or, still better, some finely shred green onion-tops mixed with the food, is very advantageous, and, in the opinion of many persons, lessens very much the susceptibility to roup. With regard to animal food, there is none equal to the natural supply of worms and insects obtained by the hen; small worms, or a barrowful of mould, containing an ant's nest, may be given if the chickens are in a confined situation, and will be found far superior to boiled egg, chopped meat, or any more artificial substitute. Curds are frequently used, and I believe, furnish the best substitute for the natural insect food; but I have had no experience in their use, as I have never kept, nor even think it desirable to keep fowls, or at all events to rear chickens, in situations where their natural food is unattainable. It is requisite that chickens should either have a constant supply of food or be fed at very short intervals—even every hour is not too often if practicable.—Practical Poultry, by W. B. Tegetmeier.

To the Editor of THE FIELD.

DEAR MR. EDITOR,—I can fancy that for the last fortnight you may have been looking out for the sight of my handwriting, and wondering why I have been idle. In good sooth there is very little to write about at this time of the year, and I am one of those who think that it is neither politic nor right to worry our readers, at unreasonable times, with matters which can have but little interest for them. I might indeed hash up some old article on groyling fishing, or trolling for pike, and endeavour to convince the world, if not myself, that I am adding a valuable contribution to the stores of angling literature, and encouraging hosts of piscatorial neophytes to betake themselves to the study of the gentle science. But if I can humbug the world, I am not so great a proficient in the art to gull myself. And, so as the old Scotch phrase is, "Let that flee stick to the wa." Talking of angling literature, I have an article on the stocks, which I trust some day or other may prove not uninteresting to the readers of THE FIELD; and I may also ask them some day to accompany me in a walk through the shops—I suppose I ought to use the more fashionable French word "Magasins"—of the great tackle manufacturers in London. But both of these must, for the present, be put on one side.

I have heard of very little news interesting to anglers, except that a club of gentlemen, who rent part of the Test, near Whitechurch, have been trying the artificial propagation of trout in those waters with very great success. From my own experience, indeed, I should hardly have thought it necessary. So far as numbers are concerned, a fishery may be overstocked as well as understocked, and perhaps the former is the greater evil of the two. What is gained in number is lost in quality, and I would sooner catch one good fish, in good condition, than a dozen undersized starvelings, that are neither good to look at, to play with, nor to eat. On the other hand, I shall be curious to see what the effect of the cross will be in two or three years' time, if I am spared to live so long. At all events, they will have my best wishes, and those of all honest craftsmen for their success. I have only one word or two to add:—

1. To pike-fishers.—I am inclined, on the whole, to prefer natural to artificial baits. In choosing these baits, do not forget the largest baits generally kill the biggest fish. And I am also inclined to believe that roving with the live bait is the most killing way of all. If you cannot get the natural bait, the artificial ones, particularly those flexible ones sold by C. Farlow (I speak of his, because I am more familiar with them, though, no doubt, other artists are equally successful), make an admirable substitute. I know they have been found very killing in the waters above Winchester, and I also saw them used to great advantage in the river Luck, county Roscommon, Ireland. For snap-fishing, the same artist's invisible spring hook is also admirable.

2. To grayling-fishers.—The little duns, particularly with a pale yellow body and blue hackle, will kill if anything will. I saw the fish rising freely about three o'clock in the afternoon, on Thursday last. C. Farlow has just dressed some flies after the patterns given in a new publication devoted to grayling fishing, by Jackson (and which deserves a separate notice of itself), which cannot be too highly praised. In this, as in everything else, the proof of the pudding, &c. I am afraid you will be weary with this dull note, and still more so if I scribble on; so, no more at present from "your loving friend,"

"Longparish House, near Whitechurch, Hants, October 21st, 1846.
"Sir,—I cannot resist informing you of the extraordinary effect that I have experienced by taking only a few of your Lozenges. I had a cough for several weeks, that denied all that had been prescribed for me; and yet I got completely rid of it by taking about half a small box of your Lozenges, which I find are the only ones that relieve the cough without deranging the stomach or digestive organs.

LEADEN PIPES.

"The above engraving represents accurately a section of a leaden pipe, which was employed for a short time in conveying water from a well on the grounds of Mr. Dick, of Bonchurch, Isle of Wight.
The original section of pipe is 84 in. long, 2 1/2 in. diameter, and 5-16 in. thick. A great part of the internal surface is corroded by the action of the water; but, as shown in the drawing, four deep excavations have been made, and another is shaded out of view by the manner in which the section of the pipe has been cut. The water has cut these deep pits almost through the pipe, and not only upon the portion which we have illustrated, but have formed similar channels throughout the entire length."— nial below.

several years; and I am informed that it is to be adopted generally in the houses that are being erected here."

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.—An extraordinary and rapid Cure of Erysipelas in the Leg, after medical aid had failed.
Copy of a Letter from Mrs. Elizabeth Yeates, of the Post-office, Aldwick-road, near Bognor, Sussex, dated January 12th, 1853.

TO PROFESSOR HOLLOWAY.

Sir,—I suffered for a considerable period from a severe attack of erysipelas, which at length settled in my leg, and resisted all medical treatment. My sufferings were very great, and I quite despaired of any permanent amendment, when I was advised to have recourse to your Ointment and Pills. I did so without delay, and am happy to say the result was eminently successful, for they effected a radical cure of my leg, and restored me to the enjoyment of health. I shall ever speak with the utmost confidence of your medicines, and have recommended them to others in this neighbourhood similarly afflicted, who derived equal benefit.

I am, Sir, your obliged and faithful servant,
(Signed) ELIZABETH YEATES.

SEWAGE CHARCOAL MANURE.

THIS highly fertilising MANURE, which is Peat Charcoal, completely saturated with London Sewage, will be found most efficient for every species of crop, more especially for Peas, Beans, Turnips, Mangold Wurzel, and other root crops. It will produce a greater return for the outlay than Guano or any other manure at an equivalent value; it also possesses the property of retaining its fertilising power longer than other Manures now in use. It may be obtained at the SEWAGE MANURE WORKS, Stanley-bridge, Fulham, at 4 per ton, and, in quantities less than half a ton, at 5s. per ton, for ready money only; and in quantities not less than a ton will be delivered at the London termini of the Railways free of charge for carriage. THE SUCCESSFUL RESULTS OF THE LAST HALF CENTURY HAVE PROVED BEYOND QUESTION THAT ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL possesses peculiarly nourishing powers in the growth, restoration, and improvement of the human hair, and is now universally acknowledged to be the cheapest, and superior to all preparations for the hair. It prevents it from falling off or turning grey, strengthens weak hair, cleanses it from scurf and dandruff, and makes it beautifully soft, curly, and glossy. Its operation in cases of baldness is peculiarly active; and in the growth of the beard, whiskers, eyebrows, and moustachins, it is unfailing in its stimulative operation. For children it is especially recommended, as forming the basis of a beautiful head of hair. In dressing the hair nothing can equal its effect, rendering it so admirably soft that it will lie in any direction, and imparting a transcendent lustre.

Price 3s. 6d. and 7s. Family Bottles (equal to four small), 10s. 6d., and double that size, 21s.

CAUTION.—On the Wrapper of each Bottle are the words ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, in two lines. The same are engraved on the back of the Wrapper nearly 1,500 times, containing 29,028 letters.

Sold by A. ROWLAND and SONS, 20, Hatton-garden, London, and by all Chemists and Perfumers.

POST OFFICE LONDON DIRECTORY for 1855. The work has been so greatly extended that the division entitled "Street Directory" contains 152,416 names, being about 34,000 more than have ever appeared in the corresponding division of any other book. Its distinguishing feature is that in it all the streets, squares, crescents, &c., of the metropolis and its suburbs appear in one general alphabetical arrangement; it is, therefore, the only work in which the occupant of any house can be ascertained.

The 152,416 names are carried into all the classifications to which they are appropriate, each in its proper alphabetical position; all the members of any profession or trade, whether in the metropolis or its suburbs, are in the "Trades" division arranged alphabetically in one list. This being the only work in which they are so, is the only one in which all the members of any trade can be ascertained.

The mobility, gentry, and professional persons resident in London and its suburbs, are included in the one general "Court" alphabetical list, now so greatly extended that it includes upwards of Forty-four Thousand names.

An accurately compiled "Conveyance Directory," so comprehensive as to include all the Railway Stations and Money-Order Offices in Great Britain, is included in the volume, which also contains a large amount of miscellaneous information, as—House of Peers, in their order of precedence—Provincial Inns, with their holders—Arrangements of the Law Courts—Names of all Postmasters in England and Wales—Periodical Publications, with their Publishers—not any part of which is to be found in any other London Directory. It besides, includes a list of the most important adjuncts, as—Index to Streets, Places, Chambers, &c., &c., with full Money-order information.

"The copiousness and accuracy of the 'Post Office London Directory' are wonderful."—Morning Chronicle, 3rd Nov., 1854.

"Its reputation for accuracy and completeness defies the least whisper of suspicion or reproach."—Morning Herald, 4th Nov., 1854.

"After carefully examining the book in its several sub-divisions, we feel bound to acknowledge its very great accuracy."—Morning Advertiser, Nov. 7, 1854.

"The number for the ensuing year, however, far exceeds all that have gone before it."—Standard, 7th Nov., 1854.

"We believe the book to be, on the whole, as perfect as human labour and human ingenuity can make it."—Globe, Nov. 8th, 1854.

"Nicholas might face the Lancaster cannon, but he would turn pale and tail at the sight of the 'Post Office Directory.'"—Atlas, 4th Nov., 1854.

"Truly we may class the Directory among modern wonders."—Weekly Dispatch, 5th Nov., 1854.

"Full worthy of its unrivalled reputation as a metropolitan directory."—Sunday Times, 5th Nov., 1854.

"Complete as it appeared to be, the inventive power of the proprietor has yet devised some further improvements upon the publication of last year."—John Bull, 4th Nov., 1854.

"For utility and information as a class work, it is unrivalled."—Morning Journal, 4th Nov., 1854.

"Improved at every point where improvement is possible."—Herapath's Journal, 4th Nov., 1854.

"It is truly one of the wonders of the age, and reflects the highest credit on the ability, industry, and punctuality of its conductors."—Weekly Times, 5th Nov., 1854.

THE FIELD OF WAR.

OPERATIONS OF THE FLEET AT THE SIEGE OF SEBASTOPOL.

OFFICIAL DESPATCHES.

[From the London Gazette Extraordinary.]

ADMIRALTY, Nov. 6, 1854.

The following despatches from Vice-Admiral Dundas have this day been received at the Admiralty. In the action now announced, 44 English were killed and 266 wounded.

"Britannia, off the Katscha, Oct. 13, 1854.

"Sir,—I beg you will acquaint the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty that the allied armies are employed in erecting batteries to the south of Sebastopol, but I hear are much retarded by the rocky nature of the ground; the Russian fire of shot and shell by day and night has produced little or no effect. The naval and marine battalions are healthy, and there is less sickness in the army.

"2. Sir Edmund Lyons, in the Agamemnon, with the Diamond and a squadron of steamers, is at Balaklava assisting the troops. A French squadron, under Vice-Admiral Bruat, is anchored between the lighthouse and the harbour in communication with the left of the French army. A division of steam-vessels watches the mouth of the port constantly, where four or five Russian steam-vessels always have their steam up, and the large sailing-vessels are with Admiral Hamelin and myself, anchored off the Katscha River, the weather hitherto having permitted our remaining in those positions.

"3. The Sidon and Indefatigable, with the Cacique and Caton, are still in Odessa Bay, to prevent any communication by sea with the Crimea, and I have sent a transport to them with coals and fresh provisions, which I have drawn from Sinope.

"4. On the 11th an Austrian vessel, laden with hay for the Commissariat, got within range of the batteries, and was deserted by her crew at the second shot. She ran on shore about 1,500 yards south of the harbour mouth, and was got off that evening and towed to Balaklava. I enclose the report of Captain Jones, of the Samson, who, with Captain Stewart, of the Firebrand, and Mr. Boxer, Second Master in charge of the Beagle, assisted by the French launches of the inshore squadron, got the Austrian to sea from under the batteries in a very successful and creditable manner. The Firebrand has four shots in her hull, but, fortunately, no casualties.

"4. I learnt from Captain King, of the Leander, of the approach to Eupatoria of a large Russian force near the town. I have sent the Firebrand and Vesuvius to assist in the defence, should it be attacked, and shall send two other vessels to-day.

"6. The French and Turkish troops sent for from Varna and Constantinople by the Simoon, Vulcan, Cyclops, and our transports, are hourly expected; they have been kept back and detained by the late strong north-east gales.

I have, &c.,

"J. W. D. DUNDAS, Vice-Admiral.

"To the Secretary of the Admiralty, &c."

"Britannia, off the Katscha, Oct. 18.

"Sir,—I beg you will acquaint the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty that the siege batteries of the allied armies opened fire upon the Russian works south of Sebastopol about half-past six o'clock yesterday morning, with great effect, and small loss.

"2. In consequence of the most urgent request of Lord Raglan and General Canrobert, it was agreed by the admirals of the allied fleets that the whole of the ships should assist the land attack by engaging the sea batteries north and south of the harbour, on a line across the port, as shown in the accompanying plan, but various circumstances rendered a change in the position of the ships necessary and unavoidable.

"3. The Agamemnon, Sanspareil, Samson, Tribune, Terrible, Sphinx, Lynx, Albion, London, Arethusa, towed by the Firebrand, Niger, and Triton, engaged Fort Constantine and the batteries to the northward; while the Queen, Britannia, Trafalgar, Vengeance, Rodney, Bellerophon, with Vesuvius, Furios, Retribution, Highflyer, Spitfire, Spiteful, and Cyclops, lashed on the port side of the several ships, gradually took up their positions, as nearly as possible as marked on the plan.

"4. The action lasted from about half-past one to half-past six p.m., when, being quite dark, the ships hauled off.

"5. The loss sustained by the Russians, and the damage done to Fort Constantine and batteries cannot, of course, as yet be correctly ascertained.

"6. An action of this duration against such formidable and well-armed works could not be maintained without serious injury, and I have to regret the loss of 44 killed and 266 wounded, as detailed in the accompanying lists. The ships, masts, yards, and rigging are more or less damaged, principally by shells and hot shot. The Albion has suffered much in hull and masts, the Rodney in her masts, she having tailed on the reef, from which she was got off by the great exertions of Commander Kynaston, of the Spiteful, whose crew and vessel were necessarily exposed in performing this service; but, with the exception of the Albion and Arethusa, which ships I send to Constantinople to be repaired, I hope to be able to make my squadron serviceable in twenty-four hours. Foreseeing from the nature of the attack that we should be likely to lose spars, I left the spare topmasts and yards on board her Majesty's ship Vulcan at this anchorage, where I had placed her with all the sick and prisoners.

"7. I have now the pleasure of recording my very great satisfaction of the ability and zeal displayed by Rear-Admirals Sir Edmund Lyons and the Hon. Montagu Stopford, and all the captains under my command, as well as my sincere thanks to them, and to the officers, seamen, and marines employed, for their unremitting exertions and the rapidity of their fire, in the absence of a large number of the crews of each ship, who were landed to assist in working the siege batteries, &c., on shore, and to this circumstance I attribute the small loss of killed and wounded.

"8. The gallant and skilful conduct of our French allies in this action was witnessed by me with admiration, and I hear with regret that they have also suffered considerable loss.

"9. I beg to express my gratitude at the manner in which Ahmed Pasha, the Turkish Admiral, did his duty.—I have, &c., (Signed) "J. W. D. DUNDAS, Vice-Admiral.

"The Secretary of the Admiralty, &c."

ADMIRALTY, MIDNIGHT, NOVEMBER 6, 1854.

A despatch, of which the following is a copy, has this night been received at the Admiralty:—

Britannia, off the Katscha, Oct. 23.

Sir,—I beg to acquaint you, for the information of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and since my letter of the 18th inst., the siege batteries have continued their fire against the Russian works, which appear to have suffered much, and the fire slackened, although it is still considerable.

2. The Naval Brigade are doing good service, and up to the 20th had a loss of twelve killed and fifty-three wounded, as per annexed list. By the desire of Lord Raglan, I have reinforced them by 410 officers and seamen, and placed Lord John Hay in the Wasp, under the orders of Captain Lushington.

3. Captain Brock, at Eupatoria, supported by the Leander and Megera, has maintained his position well, although threatened and attacked by heavy bodies of cavalry, with guns; we have drawn large supplies from there; but, as the Russians are destroying all the villages, I fear they will in future become very scanty and uncertain.

4. Since the action of the 17th the enemy have been working incessantly in repairing their batteries, and in constructing new works on the north side of the harbour, commanding the approaches by sea and land.

5. I have sent the Albion and Arethusa to Constantinople to repair; the other ships of the fleet have fished their masts, &c., and are ready for service.

6. The Lynx, Sphinx, Stromboli, and Viper have arrived.

7. The weather hitherto has been very favourable, and the crews of the ships are generally healthy.

8. The English and French Steam Division still continue in the Bay of Odessa, actively employed in preventing communication with the Crimea. I have, &c.,

J. W. D. DUNDAS, Vice-Admiral.

To the Secretary of the Admiralty, &c.

PRIVATE ACCOUNTS OF THE BATTLE.

At six o'clock on the morning of the 17th Oct. the discharge of heavy batteries announced that at last the long-expected moment had arrived, and the allies had begun firing. Every report—and they succeeded each other with marvellous rapidity—was only a signal for greater exertion among the sailors to get ready for action. Soon after the Russian prisoners, who had been on board the different vessels since Alma and Balaklava, were sent off to the Simoon, and the captains and masters summoned to come on board the flag-ship to receive their last instructions. At the same time the signal was made "Prepare to receive a steamer on the port side." About nine o'clock everything assumed more and more the aspect of activity. The steamers got their topgallantmasts, signals chased signals on board the flag-ship, and several of the large screws—for instance, the Sanspareil and a French screw—went first. The steamers came up gradually, and began to pair off with the liners to which they were lashed in the following order:—

Queen,	lashed alongside	the Vestruins.
Vengeance,	"	Highflyer.
Albion,	"	Firebrand.
Britannia,	"	Furious.
London,	"	Niger.
Arethusa,	"	Triton.
Bellerophon,	"	Cyclops.
Rodney,	"	Spiteful.
Trafalgar,	"	Retribution.

The steamers approached all on the port side, and were lashed fore and aft by cables fastened on the lower deck, and passing through the fourth porthole from bow and stern. It was nearly noon before all these preparations had been made and the ships had weighed anchor. The French led, the Turks followed, and last came the English. As it would have been impossible to approach the forts on the north side without having to suffer from the south forts under great disadvantages, it was determined that the French ships and Turkish ships, which were the first, should engage the south forts, while the English men-of-war should have to do with the north forts. The Napoleon led the way, and approached under a heavy fire, followed by the Henri IV., lashed to a steamer. At one o'clock the firing was opened, and soon after the detached English steamers, which had to engage the northernmost forts—among others the Wasp battery, so called because she sent some heavy shots into the Wasp—approached their destination and joined in the firing. Unfortunately the wind was from the land, and the smoke so dense that very few vessels succeeded in getting into the position which was assigned to them. I suppose it must be attributed to this that the French and Turkish vessels went so far to the left as to prevent several of the English vessels from approaching. So it happened, for instance, to the Queen, which led the English squadron, and had consequently to occupy the extreme right of the English position, but which was obliged to get up her anchor and change her place because the Napoleon and the Turkish Admiral's ship Mahmudieli went right in her way. The order was to keep 1,200 yards off the forts, but the disengaged steamers, and at their head the splendid Agamemnon, approached much nearer, and poured in their shot and shell with unceasing activity. This example was followed by the Queen, which was obliged to leave her place because two steamers came into her way, but ran down along the line and joined the detached steamers—a movement which the Agamemnon answered by a "Well done, Queen!" Soon after her the Rodney made the same movement, and ran down towards the fort on Cape Constantine, keeping up a brave fire until dark. Arethusa suffered very much, and it is said must go into dock, and the Retribution lost her mainmast.

P.S.—The post has been delayed for a few hours, and I re-open my letter, in order to give you some further particulars about the first bombardment of Sebastopol. The lashing of the steamers alongside of the line-of-battle ships did very well; they answer the helm far better than if towed, and the steamers are exposed to less danger, being comparatively protected by their huge companions. Of course they could not escape entirely, but, with the exception of the Firebrand, which lost her jibboom and suffered severely besides, none of the steamers were disabled, and every one was capable of taking her charge back again. The vessels, after being lashed, filed off in three lines—the Queen at the head of the right, the Britannia at the head of the middle, the detached steamers forming the extreme left. They steamed down as far as Quarantine Point before they stood in. They were to have taken up their position, and have anchored at the places assigned to them; but, owing to the smoke, which was perfectly blinding, or to some misunderstanding, the French and Turks approached too far north, and consequently the intended line could not be kept. The most prominent feature was the smoke and the detached steam squadron, composed of the Agamemnon, Sanspareil, Terrible, and Samson, which lay in close enough. The Queen, which took up for a time her place among them, was obliged to retire, a red-hot shot having set fire to her; but the Rodney, which arrived there more towards dark, remained without considerable injury to the last. It is owing to this close neighbourhood that the Agamemnon and Sanspareil lost so many men. A great disadvantage was that the vessels approached only one after the other, instead of advancing rather in a line, so as to commence firing about the same time. By approaching so gradually the ships which went later into action could scarcely get a momentary look at the forts at which they had to fire, much less obtain an estimate of the distance which they were off from it. Moreover, the gradual approach of one vessel after the other afforded the Russians the facility of concentrating the fire of their batteries on one vessel.

River Katscha, Oct. 18.

The following is a copy of a few details of yesterday's cannonading of the Sebastopol forts by the fleet, which may be interesting:—

"Yesterday, the 17th, about half-past noon, the French fleet commenced the cannonade, leading in from the south along the south forts, exposed at the same time to a severe fire from the north as well as the south forts, which was not returned until their position was taken up. Admiral Dundas followed with most of his fleet, steering first southward and rounding up again, taking position northward of the French, the Britannia and Napoleon being next ships, and placed towards the mouth of the harbour. The Terrible and Samson began on the north side from the northward, the first interchanging a heavy fire with the large fort on the north side (two tiers of guns and a third tier en barbette—I think, Fort Constantine). The Terrible kept at it with her engines stopped. The Samson, disregarding the large fort, directed her fire on two very mischievous little forts on the parapet of the precipice which overlooks the sea fort northward of Fort Constantine—the Wasp and Telegraph forts. Occupied with these, she steamed right through the fire of the big fort, swept round in a beautiful manner, and again went straight at them. All the fire, however, which was directed throughout the day at these two forts seemed to have little effect. Silenced only at intervals, they continued a most galling fire. While the Britannia was rounding in from seaward, the Agamemnon proceeded along the north coast southward, to where the Samson and Terrible were engaged. It was evident that this ship had a distinct mark in view. Cautiously closing with the land, she anchored within 900 yards of Fort Constantine, and she must have been quite close to very shoal water. This was the position of the day, and here the Agamemnon remained until nearly sunset, when she came out, but only owing to the closing darkness. She was closely supported by the Sanspareil asteru, and later in the day by the Bellerophon on her bow. Later the fort (Constantine, I think) which they were engaged with was almost silent, and the guns en barbette wholly so. The general impression is that very little damage has been inflicted on the enemy; but, though all did their best, there can be little doubt that, had the other ships been able to close with a distinct object, and hammer at it as the Agamemnon did at hers, the result would have been very different. She lay close to her work, and would have breached it; but the fire at times had to be withdrawn to silence the small forts on the hill, which were hailing her meantime. On resuming the fire on the larger forts, of course the line of fire was altered, and more distributed.

"The Albion and the London were engaged with Fort Constantine before the Agamemnon came up. They got a good deal cut up, and withdrew. The Albion had a number of men and her captain with the army, and was several times on fire while in action. Welay just outside, within fire, and not more than a mile from the Agamemnon, which was close in, and much nearer to the others. The cannonade of the French appeared terrific and continuous. Enveloped in smoke, they kept up whole salvos, which looked awful, the smoke being lit up by the volleys of flashes, and the roar of cannon continuously. The Turks followed the French in this, sometimes in whole broadsides, again their fire running continuously along the line. There was less of this with the English ships, particularly with the Agamemnon. The smoke and roar were more awful, but the other was more business-like. Captain Christie, R.N., principal agent of transports, had his flag hoisted on board the Colombo.

"Having expended the number of rounds of powder, which was limited to fifty each gun, at one time the Sanspareil withdrew, and the forts on the hill directed their full efforts at the Agamemnon. The Agamemnon fired seventy rounds, and her broadside is quite scorched the whole length. Sir Edmund Lyons, at the time occupied with the big fort, sent his flag lieutenant through a galling fire to bring in the Bellerophon and to get the Sanspareil back. He said, 'Till then to come in; these forts will sink me, and I'm— if I leave this,' and this is quite the case. He is of the truest stuff, fixes his mark, and then sticks to it.

"The Britannia remained till after dark steady also at her work, but she and the French were all too far off."

DESPATCHES FROM CONSTANTINOPLE.

TUESDAY, Oct. 24.

The dismayed and battered Albion arrived yesterday in Buyukderé Bay, towed by the Orinoco. This vessel, with the Agamemnon and Sanspareil, bore the brunt of the action. She had fifteen killed and seventy-two wounded in the day's combat. She was towed down to Constantinople this morning to be docked. As she passed, with her main and mizen topmasts shot away, and her sides showing the marks of the fray, a band on board played enlivening airs—a strange contrast to the scene which had been witnessed on board a week before. She has several large holes near the waterline, which have been temporarily boarded up and painted; and the round marks of the shot are to be seen on every part of her hull. Her vast bulk, equal to that of a first-rate, with her battered aspect, and the interest attaching to the fight, attracted crowds during her passage down the Bosphorus. The spectators eyed her silently with various ideas and sympathies—the English, with pride, mingled with sorrow, the Turks with apathy which might veil any feeling, other parts of the population with something like secret gratification. She had sent upwards of 120 men on shore previous to the commencement of the action, in which she was exposed to the hottest fire of the Russian batteries. Like the Albion and the Arethusa, the Trafalgar could not long keep her place, or, rather, she never took it up properly, for the Rodney sent a Mooroom shell into the mainmast of the Retribution, to which the Trafalgar was lashed; it burst in it, the mast went down, and both vessels were unfit for action. There was a general anticipation on board that the fleet would again try its fortune against the fortifications which it has so long watched; but, whatever may be the ardour of the sailors, it would be unwise to allow any chagrin at an incomplete result to urge the valuable squadron into action under circumstances in which our loss must at least be greater than any we can inflict on the enemy. The Arethusa (towed to sea by Emeu) is not so much injured as some of the other vessels, but she was found to be in a rotten state, and the shot which struck her knocked out whole pieces of her hull, although this would have done little damage to a sound ship. The Arethusa had only fifteen guns out of fifty; and half her crew were with the army in the trenches before Sebastopol. Lieutenant Lloyd (Triton) is still alive at the naval hospital at Therapia (Bosphorus), although his wound is most severe, and his escape from instant death wonderful. A shell struck him under the arm, and tore away part of his side; the hurt, however, is not mortal, and he has the advantage of at least sufficient medical attendance. About eighty-four wounded have been landed at Therapia; two had died up to the night of the 22nd; since then there have been also one or two deaths. Many of the men who were slightly hurt have remained on board. The Orinoco, which towed down the Albion, will probably return with Turkish troops. However, the supply of these is nearly exhausted, and the arrival of French reinforcements from Marseilles would be received with satisfaction. The Albion is very much injured: it is said she was on fire in nine or ten places, and that she was only saved by great exertions. She will be patched up here, preparatory to being sent home. Her place is, however, well supplied by the Algiers, arrived Oct. 21.

THE FRENCH OFFICIAL DESPATCHES.

The following accounts are published by the French government in the Moniteur. The first despatches is from Vice-Admiral Hamelin.

"Ville de Paris, before Katscha, Oct. 18.

"Monsieur le Ministre,—In my letter of the 13th of Oct. I announced to your Excellency that I had embarked with all my staff on board the frigate Mogador, in order to anchor as near as possible to the French head-quarters, and arrange with the General-in-Chief a general attack by the land and sea forces against Sebastopol on the day when the fire of the siege batteries should commence. On the 14th I had an interview with General Canrobert, whose views were in conformity with mine. On the 15th a meeting of the Admirals of the allied squadrons took place on board the frigate Mogador, and the arrangements for the general attack were made with common accord, and were then submitted to the generals of the land forces, who heartily agreed to them.

"This general attack was fixed for the 17th, the day of the opening of the fire of the siege batteries.

"With respect to the squadrons, they were to effect what follows:—The French squadron undertook to place itself towards the rocks to the south, and at about seven cables' length, to operate against the 350 guns of the Quarantine Battery, the two batteries of Fort Alexander, and the battery of the artillery.

"The English squadron had to attack towards the rocks to the north, at about the same distance, the 130 guns of the Constantine Battery, the Telegraph Battery, and the Maximilian Tower to the north.

"If your Excellency would imagine a line traced along the entrance to Sebastopol from the east to the west, that line would separate into two parts the locality of the attack which devolved upon each squadron.

"The Turkish Admiral with two vessels, all that he remained at the time, was to cast anchor to the north of the two French lines—that is to say in an intermediate position between the English and French vessels. On the morning of the 17th the attack of the siege batteries commenced; but, as the weather was calm, it was necessary to attach the ships of the line to the steam-frigates before developing against Sebastopol the line of the twenty-ships of the allied squadrons. Nevertheless, in spite of this difficulty, and the separation which had taken place between the ships of the allied squadrons, a part of which had anchored at Kamisch and part before the Katscha, I have the satisfaction to announce to your Excellency that the ships of our first line advanced about half-past twelve in the day under the fire of the batteries of Sebastopol, which they stood against at first during more than half-an-hour without replying. A few minutes afterwards they replied vigorously to the fire, which did not fail to incommode them, from their small number. Afterwards the other French and English vessels successively arrived, and the attack became general.

"Towards half-past two o'clock the fire of the Russian batteries slackened; it was stopped at the Quarantine Battery. This was the exact object desired by the French squadron, but our firing was redoubled and continued without interruption till night.

"At the time I am writing to your Excellency I am not aware of what was the success of our siege batteries, whose fire had commenced before ours, and which attacked the Russian fortifications on the land side.

"If the Russians had not closed the entrance to Sebastopol by sinking two ships of the line and two frigates, I do not doubt that the vessels of the squadrons, after the first fire, would have been able successfully to enter the port and place themselves in communication with the army. Perhaps they would not have lost many more men in doing this than we have now to regret; but the extreme measure which the enemy adopted of sacrificing a portion of his ships forced us to confine ourselves to attacking for five hours the sea batteries of Sebastopol, with the object of silencing them more or less, of occupying a great many men of the garrison at the guns, and of giving thus to our army material as well as moral assistance.

"To-day, the 18th, I have only time to give a hasty sketch to your Excellency of this affair, which, in my opinion, does great honour to the French navy.

"I subjoin to this sketch a list of the killed and wounded on board of each ship. Without delay I shall send you a detailed report upon all the phases of the attack, and in reference to the part, more or less active, which each ship took in it.

"At the commencement of the affair the enthusiasm was extreme. During the combat the tenacity of every one was not less so. Before commencing the fire I signalled to the squadron France has her eyes upon you, a signal which was received with cries of Vive l'Empereur!

"I am, with deep respect, Monsieur le Ministre, your Excellency's very obedient servant, the Vice-Admiral Commander-in-Chief of the squadron of the Mediterranean."

"HAMELIN."

[Appended to the report of Admiral Hamelin is a list of the killed and wounded on board the ships of the squadron. The Admiral's ship, Ville de Paris, had four killed, among whom was Lieutenant Sommeiller, Aide-de-Camp to the Admiral, and Komrschud, an Egyptian Midshipman, and 42 wounded, including the three other Aides-de-Camp of the Admiral. The Vahny had 4 killed and 26 wounded; the Friedland 11 killed and 31 wounded; Henry IV., 15 wounded; Suffren, 4 wounded; Montchello, 6 killed and 26 wounded, among whom was a midshipman named Fitz-James; Charlemagne, 2 killed and 35 wounded; Jean Bart, 1 killed and 1 wounded; Canada, 1 killed and 5 wounded; Primauguet, 1 killed—in all 32 killed and 180 wounded. The following ships took part in the engagement without experiencing any casualty:—The Pomone, Mogador, Albatros, Labrador, Christophe Colomb, Uloa, Orenoque, Phaton, Ajaccio, Jupiter, Marcugo, Alger, Bayard, and Ville de Marseilles.]

Therapia, Oct. 20.

You will hear from all sides that at Sebastopol our sailors fought valiantly: every one did his duty, and in the most noble manner. The Charlemagne, arrived at her station the first, and for half an hour supported alone the fire of all the Russian forts, returning their fire with a vigour which was the admiration of both squadrons. A shell burst on the stern of the Ville de Paris, and the poop was knocked to pieces. By a kind of miracle Admiral Hamelin was not injured; but of his four aides-de-camp one, M. Sommeiller, was killed, and the others were wounded, as well as several other persons who were standing near. M. Bouet-Williammez, the chief of the staff, escaped as fortunately as the Admiral. The four aides-de-camp of Admiral Hamelin were put hors de combat. One of them was cut in two by a cannon-ball; another, M. Zélé, had his two legs shattered; the other two were not dangerously wounded. At nightfall the fleets suspended their firing, and returned to their anchorage.

THE MINISTER OF MARINE has been informed, by a report of the naval commander at Gallipoli, dated 29th ult., that on the morning of the 27th the French commercial steamer Laromignière, which left Varna with 500 convalescent soldiers, had run ashore at the Black Cape, on the Asiatic coast, at the entrance of the Sea of Marmora. Notwithstanding the exertions of the war steamer Gorgone and the steam-tug Wouder, sent to her assistance by the naval commander of Gallipoli, she could not be got off. Driven towards the coast by a strong north-easterly wind and a frightful sea, the Laromignière, although very solidly built, was stove in by the rocks, and immediately filled. The 500 passengers were fortunately removed the first day on board the Gorgone, and safely landed at Gallipoli.

GENERAL CANROBERT'S DESPATCH.

Head-quarters before Sebastopol, Oct. 18.

Monsieur le Maréchal,—Yesterday, at sunrise, we opened our fire in concert with the English army. Matters were proceeding favourably, when the explosion of the powder-magazine of a battery, which unfortunately was of a serious character, threw our attack into disorder. This explosion produced greater effect from the fact that our batteries were accumulated round the point where it took place. The enemy profited by it to increase his fire, and, in accord with the general commanding the artillery, I was of opinion that it was necessary for us to suspend ours in order to make repairs, and to complete towards our right, by fresh batteries connected with those of the English army, the system of our attack. This delay is no doubt to be regretted, but we must resign ourselves to it, and I am taking every necessary step to render it as short as possible.

The place kept up the fire better than was expected. The circle is of such a formidable development in a right line, and comprises guns of such large calibre, that it can prolong the struggle. On the 17th our troops took possession of the height before the point of attack called the Bistion of the Mat, and occupied it. This evening we shall raise upon it a masked battery of twelve pieces, and, if it be possible, also a second battery at the extreme right above the ravine.

All the means of attack are concentrated upon this bastion, and will enable us, I hope, soon to take possession of it, with the assistance of the English batteries, which are directed against its face.

Yesterday, about ten o'clock in the morning, the English fleet attacked the external batteries of the place, but I have not yet received any particulars to enable me to give you an account of the result of this attack.

The English batteries are in the best possible condition. Eight new mortars have been placed in them, calculated to produce great effect. Yesterday there was, in the battery which surrounds the tower situated to the left of the place, a tremendous explosion, which must have done much injury to the enemy. Since then this battery has fired very little, and this morning there are only two or three guns which can fire.

I have no precise information about the Russian army. There is nothing to indicate that it has changed the positions it occupied, where it awaits reinforcements.

I have received almost the whole of the reinforcement of artillery which I expected from Gallipoli and Varna. General Levaillant has just arrived with his staff, which increases to five divisions the effective force of infantry which I have under my orders. Their state of health is satisfactory and their discipline excellent, and we are all full of confidence.

CANROBERT.

The French Minister of War has received the following further report from General Canrobert, Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the East:—

"Before Sebastopol, October 22.

"MONSIEUR LE MARÉCHAL,—Our works of approach continue according to the plan indicated in my preceding despatch of the 18th. I have not time to write to you at length, but I have the honour to send you the journal of the siege, which will make you acquainted with all the details of our operations.

"The difficulties with which we meet are of two kinds—those which result from the nature of the soil, the solid stratum of which, already insufficient, diminishes in proportion as we approach the place, and those resulting from the number and the calibre of the pieces of artillery which the enemy plants against us almost in a right and very extended line. In this respect, the resources which he draws from his vessels stationed in the port—men as well as materials—are almost inexhaustible; while ours, although augmented by the loans which we make from the two fleets, are necessarily limited. The 68-pounders, the eighty howitzers, and the 12-inch mortars are, in short, almost the only artillery upon which we can rely.

"This position renders the siege of Sebastopol one of the most laborious operations which have been met with for a long time, and the efforts which we are compelled to make to carry them into effect will explain the delays that have arisen.

"In the night of the 20th the enemy made an attempt to spike our guns, which failed. A few men who, by a surprise, entered our batteries, were killed there by the officer in command.

"The losses which we have experienced from the fire of the enemy are by no means so considerable as might have been expected, considering the difficulties of our position, which I have explained to you.

"I send successively, and by all the means which the fleet places at my disposal, my wounded to Constantinople, where our hospital resources have assumed a more satisfactory character.

"The state of health of the army is satisfactory. The maladies which have arisen have been produced by the excessive fatigue which our brave soldiers have had to undergo. The naval gunners who have landed have also been attacked with illness. They evince a courage and devotion which are remarked by the whole army.

"Accept, Monsieur le Maréchal, the assurance of my respectful devotion. The General Commander-in-Chief."

"CANROBERT."

The following is from the Moniteur (Paris) of Wednesday: "A Constantinople letter says:—We left the Bay of Kamischli on the evening of the 26th. The fire of the besieged had much slackened, and the aim had become more and more uncertain. It is believed at head-quarters that the Russians begin to want artillerymen, and that it is the infantry who work the guns. We are to-morrow to enter a trench at 400 metres from the place.

"On the 25th the Russians, to the number of 20,000, attacked our rear, which was defended by the Turks, and took possession of the redoubt guarded by the latter. The English commenced the attack, giving notice of it to General Canrobert, who sent the Second Division and a squadron of Chasseurs. Our cavalry, assisted by the English cavalry, repulsed the enemy by a most brilliant charge, during which the combat was sustained for nearly five minutes with the sword. The positions were retaken.

"The English lost 124 men belonging to the Queen's squadron which recently arrived. In all, their loss amounts to 400 men. Our loss is not so great, but we have to regret the deaths of two officers.

"It is believed at head-quarters that the assault will be made on Wednesday or Thursday (the 1st or 2d of November). The inhabitants are in want of water, and appear to be much discouraged."

BATTLE AT BALAKLAVA—SUCCESS OF SIR DE LACY EVANS.

The Constitutionnel (Paris) gives the following summary of the news received from the Crimea, with respect to the attack made by General Liprandi on the heights of Balaklava.

"A Russian despatch, received a few days ago, announced that on the 23rd and 24th General Liprandi had two combats with the allied troops. Some accounts placed the scene of them at Balaklava; others at the north of Sebastopol, in the environs of Eupatoria. The despatches published by the English Government, and some private letters, have thrown a complete light on the two combats. The Russians, after a trifling success, have lost the last chance of delivering Sebastopol. It is known that the allied army forms a semicircle round Sebastopol. The French extend from Cape Chersonesus and the sea to the rivulet which flows into the military port of Sebastopol, and the English from that rivulet to the river Chernaya. At about 2½ leagues from the lines of the besiegers is Balaklava, where the English artillery was disembarked, where the magazines of the allies are established, and where the latter communicate with the fleet. The protection of Balaklava was confided to 1,200 marines, supported by a detachment of cavalry and artillery. At two kilometres (1½ miles) above Balaklava, on the road which leads to Sebastopol, and at the point at which a second road leading to Simferopol and into the interior of the Crimea strikes off, we meet the first heights of the Tauric chain. These heights, which dominate on the one hand Balaklava, and on the other the barren steppe in which the allies are encamped, were defended by redoubts, the guard of which were confided to the Turkish troops. Finally, at the foot of these heights, and in the rear of the besiegers, were the corps destined to cover the siege; for the French, the division of General Bosquet supported on the sea; for the English, the division of the Duke of Cambridge; and finally, two brigades of English cavalry, under the orders of Lord Lucan, protecting the Chernaya. After receiving General Liprandi's reinforcements, Prince Menschikoff resolved to turn the right of the allied army, in order to place the besiegers between two fires, and make a bold attack on Balaklava. If this coup de main had succeeded, the allies could only have communicated with the fleets by Cape Chersonesus, would no longer have had an open road to the sea, and would have been deprived of their magazines; and yet they would have been obliged to reply to the fire of Sebastopol, and to defend themselves in their entrenchments. They would, consequently, have become besieged in their turn. General Liprandi, with all the troops which Prince Menschikoff could spare, entered the mountain from which the Chernaya flows, and which the allied army had crossed in its turning movement from the Belbek to Balaklava. He succeeded completely in disguising his march from the allies, as is proved by the arrival of the English despatch, and the ignorance in which General Canrobert in his report says he was as to the position of the enemy. That, however, need cause no surprise in such a mountainous country, cut through by frightful ravines, and covered with forests almost impenetrable—in which, consequently, it is impossible for the cavalry to be on the look-out. All that the allies could do was to be on their guard in their entrenchments; and that is why they had thrown up so many points of resistance from Chernaya to Balaklava. The difficulty of the ground appears not to have permitted General Liprandi to execute completely his turning movement. The complete absence of beaten paths obliged him no doubt to take the road from Simferopol to Balaklava, and on the 25th October the Russians appeared on the heights in face of the redoubts of the allies. Whether the Turks were not on their guard, or were not in sufficient numbers to defend themselves, is not known; but it is certain that they abandoned their redoubts after spiking their cannon, threw themselves into complete disorder into the plain, and went to give an alarm to the corps which covered the siege. These corps immediately marched out. The division of light cavalry, under the command of Lord Cardigan, arrived the first, and immediately charged the Russians, who descended in good order into the plain in pursuit of the Turks. In spite of their courage, the three regiments which compose this brigade in vain endeavoured to check the march of the enemy. The Dragoon Guards went to their aid, and were at first more fortunate; but their ranks were broken by the artillery of the redoubts, of which the Russians had turned the cannon, after unspiking them, against the allies. In the meantime the British infantry arrived in line. It held firm under the fire of the Russian infantry, and under that of the redoubts, and thus gave time to the division of General Bosquet, the farthest from the scene of action, to come up, and to form. The allies then took the offensive, and drove back the Russians to the heights. There the latter succeeded in maintaining themselves in possession of two of the redoubts which they had carried. Thus ended the first day, which was extremely sanguinary and undecided.

Of what took place on the following day we have only few details. The bold movement of General Liprandi had partly failed, since Balaklava remained in the power of the allies, and the latter preserved their communication with the sea; it had partly succeeded, since the Russians were in possession of the sole beaten road, which leads from Balaklava to Sebastopol, and had taken position in the rear of the besiegers. Accordingly, on the 26th, Prince Menschikoff made a strong sortie against the English lines in order to place them between two fires. If he had succeeded in carrying them, and effecting a junction with General Liprandi, in the midst of the besieging army, the operations of the allies would have been almost irreparably compromised. But the 26th put an end to the hopes of the Russian Generalissimo; after a very sharp engagement, he was driven back into Sebastopol by the division of General Sir De Lacy Evans, with a loss of more than 1,000 men. At the same time the allies attacked in front the heights occupied by General Liprandi, took the redoubts which the Russians had captured the previous evening, and drove back the latter, completely broken and demoralised, beyond the Chernaya, in the ravines of the mountains. The fortunate issue of these two combats appear to us to decide the fate of Sebastopol. The attack of General Liprandi was the last chance which the Russians possessed of compelling the allies to raise the siege. The siege will henceforth follow its regular course. The result is the less doubtful, as, masters of the course of the Chernaya, the allies are equally in possession of the great aqueduct, parallel to that river, which alone conveys potable water to the military establishments and all the eastern part of Sebastopol. By cutting off this aqueduct, the allies have been able to reduce the garrison and the inhabitants to the water in the cisterns. As the rainy season has not yet commenced, almost all the cisterns are empty, and the place consequently suffers frightfully. Some letters even affirm that at the last date a glass of clear water cost a rouble. We see, for the allies, nothing but motives for hope.

DESPATCHES FROM LORD RAGLAN.

The following despatches appear in the London Gazette Extraordinary—

PORTMAN-SQUARE, Midnight, Nov. 6, 1854.

His Grace the Duke of Newcastle has this evening received despatches, of which the following are copies, addressed to his Grace by General Lord Raglan, G.C.B.:

Before Sebastopol, Oct. 23, 1854.

MY LORD DUKE.—The operations of the siege have been carried on unceasingly since I addressed your Grace on the 18th instant. [This despatch has not yet been received.]

On that afternoon, the French batteries not having been able to re-open, the enemy directed their guns almost exclusively on the British entrenchments, and maintained a very heavy fire upon them till the day closed, with less damage, I am happy to say, to the works, and with fewer casualties, than might have been anticipated.

On the following morning, shortly after daylight, General Canrobert not only resumed his fire from the batteries which had been injured, but materially added to the weight of his attack by the fire of batteries which he had caused to be constructed the previous day, and these have continued ever since; and he has had it in his power to push his approaches forward, and, like the English, materially to injure the defences of the place; but these are as yet far from being subdued, neither is a serious diminution of their fire perceptible.

Our fire has also been constant and effective; but the enemy having at their disposal large bodies of men, and the resources of the fleet and arsenal at their command, have been enabled, by incessant exertion, to repair their redoubts to a certain extent, and to replace many of the guns that have been destroyed, in a very short space of time, and to resume their fire from works which we had succeeded in silencing.

The facility of repairing and re-arming the defences naturally renders the progress of the assailants slower than could be wished; and I have it not in my power to inform your Grace, with anything like certainty, when it may be expected that interior measures may be undertaken.

I have the honour to transmit to your Grace the return of killed and wounded between the 18th and 20th instant, inclusive.

In my last I announced to your Grace the death which had just been reported to me of that deeply lamented officer the Honourable Colonel Hood of the Grenadier Guards. No other military officer has since fallen; but Major Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar was slightly wounded on the 19th. His Serene Highness insisted, however, upon remaining in the trenches until the detachment to which he was attached was relieved at the usual hour, and he has now resumed his duty.

Captain Lord Dunkellin, of the Coldstream Guards, was unfortunately taken prisoner yesterday morning, before daylight, in front of the trenches.

The naval batteries have continued their exertions without intermission, and I regret to have to report the death of two gallant officers of the Royal Navy—the Hon. Lieutenant Rutheven, who has died of his wounds, and Lieutenant Greathed, of H.M.S. Britannia. Both are universally regretted. The latter received a mortal wound while laying a gun, after having, to use the language of Brigadier-General Eyre, who was then in charge of the trenches, “performed his duty in the batteries in a manner that excited the admiration of all.”

A considerable body of Russians appeared two days ago in the vicinity of Balaklava, but they have since withdrawn, and are no longer to be seen in our front.

I have reason to believe that Prince Menschikoff is not in Sebastopol. He is stated to have placed himself with the main body of the army in the field, which is represented to be stationed in the plains south of Bakshi-Serai.

Admiral Korniloff, chief of the staff, and temporarily in command of Sebastopol, is reported to have died of his wounds the day before yesterday.—I have, &c.,

His Grace the Duke of Newcastle, &c. RAGLAN.

STEPHEN LUSHINGTON,

Captain Commanding Naval Brigade.

To the Military Secretary to his Excellency Lord Raglan, Commander-in-Chief of the Army.

LORD RAGLAN'S MISSING DESPATCHES.

The public will naturally have felt much surprise at the non-receipt of despatches from Lord Raglan by the same steamer conveying intelligence of the naval action off the harbour of Sebastopol, on the 17th ult., particulars of which appear in THE FIELD.

The Morning Post says, that "these deeply interesting papers, having been entrusted by Lord Raglan to Lieut. Henderson, were, by some unaccountable misfortune on the part of that officer, lost. Lieut. Henderson has arrived in London, and, so far as we have been able to ascertain, is unable to account for this most unfortunate circumstance."

FIELD OFFICE, Wednesday Nov. 8.

Mr. Seymour Tremeneheere, who left Constantinople by the additional mail steamer Gange on the 28th ult., reached London by special train last evening with despatches from Lord Stratford de Redcliffe for Lord Clarendon, but brought no intelligence from the Crimea of a later date than that already received, and no despatches for either the Minister of War or the Admiralty. Mr. Tremeneheere left Balaklava on the 23rd ult.

PRIVATE DESPATCHES FROM SEBASTOPOL.

THE LAND ATTACK.

Camp before Sebastopol, Oct. 17.

On the night of the 16th it was determined that our fire should be opened on the Russian lines the following morning, as it was evident the enemy was intrenching himself with much activity, and greatly strengthening his position. In spite of the efforts of our engineers, our works were not quite completed, and most of the mortars could not be mounted in the batteries.

Firing commenced from the French and English batteries by signal at 6.30 a.m. on the 17th, but for thirty minutes previous the Russians fired furiously on all the batteries. The cannonade on both sides was most violent for nearly two hours.

Our left attack consisted of four batteries and 36 guns; our right attack of 20 guns, in battery. There were also two Lancaster batteries and a 4-gun battery of 68-pounders on our right. The French had about 46 guns. In all we were supposed to have 117 guns to subdue about 130 guns of the Russians.

At 8 o'clock it was apparent that the French batteries in their extreme right attack, overpowered by the fire and enfiladed by the guns of the Russians, were very much weakened; their fire slackened minute after minute.

At 8.30 the fire slackened on both sides for a few minutes, but recommenced with immense energy, the whole town and the line of works enveloped in smoke.

At 8.40 the French magazine in the extreme right battery of twelve guns blew up with a tremendous explosion, killing and wounding 100 men. The Russians cheered, fired with renewed vigour, and crushed the French fire completely, so that they were not able to fire more than a gun now and then at intervals, and at ten o'clock they were nearly silenced on that side.

At 10.30 the fire slackened on both sides, but the allies and Russians re-opened vigorously at 10.45. Our practice was splendid, but our works were cut up by the fire from the redan and from the works round a circular martello tower on our extreme right.

At 12.45 the French line-of-battle ships ran up in most magnificent style and engaged the batteries on the sea side. The scene was indescribable, the Russians replying vigorously to the attacks by sea and land, though suffering greatly.

At 1.25 another magazine in the French batteries blew up. The cannonade was tremendous. Our guns demolished the Round Tower, but could not silence the works around it.

At 1.40 a great explosion took place in the centre of Sebastopol amid much cheering from our men, but the fire was not abated. The Lancaster guns made bad practice, and one burst. At 2.55 a terrific explosion of a powder magazine took place in the Russian redan fort. The Russians, however, returned to their guns, and still fired from the re-entering angle of their works. The cannonade was continuous from the ships and from our batteries, but the smoke did not permit us to see if the British fleet was engaged.

At 3.30 a loose powder-store inside our naval battery was blown up by a Russian shell, but did no damage. The enemy's earthworks were much injured by our fire, the redan nearly silenced, and the fire of the Round Tower intrenchments diminished, though the inner works are still vigorous.

At 3.35 the magazine inside the works of the Round Fort was blown up by our shot.

At 4 the ships outside were ripping up the forts and stone-works and town by tremendous broadsides. Only the French flag was visible, the English fleet being on the north or opposite side of the harbour. Orders were given to spare the town and buildings as much as possible.

From 1 to 5.30 the cannonade from our batteries was very warm, the Russians replying, though our fire had evidently established its superiority over theirs, the ships pouring in broadside after broadside on Forts Nicholas and Constantine at close ranges. Towards dusk the fire slackened greatly, and at night it ceased altogether, the Russians for the first time being silent. Up to this hour (10 p.m.) they have barely fired a gun. They are busily repairing damages, and we are doing the same, and are also mounting new guns and mortars for to-morrow.

The French have lost about 200 men, principally by the explosions; our loss is very small—under 100 killed and wounded since the siege began.

Captain Rowley, of the Guards, was killed yesterday; O'Leary, of the 68th Regiment, killed to-day; Ruthven, Lieutenant, R.N., wounded.

We have gained greatly to-day, and, but for the melancholy disasters which befel our allies, should have crushed much of the Russian batteries. The French fleet avenged these misfortunes most amply.

The Grand Duke Constantine is supposed to have entered Sebastopol.

Much of the sea side of the town is in ruins. We re-open fire at daybreak.

October 18, 3 p.m.

The fire was resumed this morning soon after daybreak. The French were still unable to support us. Their extreme left is still silenced. They will not be ready till the 19th or 20th, so damaged are they by the Russian fire.

During the night the Russians remounted their guns and brought up fresh ones, and established a great superiority of fire and weight of metal.

At 10 a.m. the alarm was given that the Russians were marching to attack our rear on the Balaklava road. Lord Raglan and staff, with large bodies of French troops, at once moved there, and found the Russian cavalry and two battalions of infantry, with one gun, endeavouring to creep up in a fog to the outposts. The Turks opened a fire from the redoubts, and the Russians retired.

At this moment (3 p.m.) the Russians are pressing us very hard, returning three shots for our two. Colonel Hood, of the Guards, was killed in the trenches to-day. Ruthven, of the Albion, is no better. Lieutenant Chase, of the Albion, is killed. Another lieutenant and 100 men were killed and wounded in our fleet yesterday while attacking Fort Constantine.

The attack by the fleets is to be renewed to-morrow. Of the siege train there are two killed, fifteen severely wounded, and eight slightly wounded. This was up to yesterday.

Our loss up to to-day is ninety-six. The redan and flagstaff fort are as troublesome as ever. The Retribution and London both their mainmasts shot away, and were on fire yesterday. They had to be hauled off.

The Agamemnon has suffered severely.

Lord J. Murray and Ellison, with 150 men of the 88th, 130 artillerymen, and six surgeons, arrived last night per Tonnage.

The sickness has much abated.

The redan fort, flagstaff fort, and Round Tower works, are firing very warmly just now.

We can scarcely get up ammunition to our guns.

HOSPITALS AT SMYRNA AND CONSTANTINOPLE.

[From the Times.]

SIR,—The extract I enclose, upon the subject of the disgraceful state in which the merchant sailors' hospitals at Smyrna and Constantinople have been, and still are, allowed to remain, will, I hope, find a place in your paper. I do trust that the Government will lose no time in having these shamefully-neglected establishments placed upon a proper footing, and rendered equal in efficiency to those of other countries. I enclose my address, as well as that of the friend who writes the letter to me.—I am your obedient servant,

November 6.

Extract from a letter from Smyrna, lately received in London.

"By way of employing the three days during which I remained at Smyrna, I went to see the British hospital, which, I must say, is a disgrace to any nation occupying the position which we hold at present in the East. The British hospital at Smyrna is intended for the exclusive benefit of British seamen from ships of war and the merchant navy. It is supported by dues levied on every British ship which arrives in the port of Smyrna. The revenue was formerly administered by the Levant Company, and was by them transferred to the Government. All this you probably know better than I do, but you may not be aware that the hospital has remained in status quo ever since the breaking up of the Levant Company. It is placed in a miserable, dilapidated old house, the ground floor of which is periodically flooded in bad weather. The rooms on the upper floor are pictures of squalid misery—the planking decayed and full of holes, the walls dirty, no modern improvements or contrivances of any kind. We found there three black Tars imprisoned in this black hole—three very jolly, good-humoured fellows; they said the bugs were as big as black currants, and that the headsteds, though constantly washed with hot water, were so old and saturated with vermin that their cries contained the 'essence of hags.' In the holes and corners of these rooms were worn-out old chests which still bore the name of the 'Levant Company' of 1807. I was assured by Mr. — and Dr. — that the horrid state of this hospital had been constantly and repeatedly reported to the home Government, but that nothing had ever been done, or even proposed to be done, to make it more habitable and fitter for the reception of sick seamen, though it was said, and has long been said, that a plan for a new hospital sent homo 'was under consideration.'

"Opposite to this British Hospital is the Dutch Hospital, a perfect model of neatness and propriety, with a garden, kept in order and planted with trees, and an air of comfort, both within and without, which so contributes to the cure of an invalid. I next visited the Greek Hospital, which is on a large scale and in excellent order, and, strange to say, clean and comfortable. Lastly, the Austrian, small, but well organised. The French one I had not time to see, but I am assured that it is admirable.

"Now, there may be some good reason for the very singular contrast which our hospital presents to these, but I cannot help thinking that if the present Government were really aware what a miserable place it is, they would take active steps to provide a better. It is no excuse to say that the English Hospital at Constantinople is worse (the civil one, I mean); there, too, the bugs drop from the ceiling on the patients' faces; there also the sad state of things has been long since reported to head-quarters, but without results. My information about the Constantinople Hospital is derived from the best authority—its physician, who told me all about it.

"In the course of this war we may want a good hospital at Smyrna for our sailors, and so we may as well get it ready at once. At present the establishment is much more like a Turkish khan than the hospital for seamen of a Christian and civilised people; and yet, forsooth, we profess to exhibit to the Turks a model to be followed in all things!"

[The complaint against these hospitals is of old date. In 1839 a work entitled "Oriental Outlines," by William Knight, was published in London by Mr. Simson Low, in which, at page 204, appears the following:—"But before I quit Constantinople, let me not omit to refer to one subject which touches my own countrymen. I hope every Englishman is sufficiently alive to the feelings of humanity to endeavour, whenever he has an opportunity, to better the condition of a fellow mortal. I therefore call with confidence upon every British traveller into whose hands this volume may fall, to visit—if he touch at Constantinople—the ENGLISH HOSPITAL. For be it from me to say who is to blame, but I fearlessly assert that this establishment in the Turkish capital is a disgrace to the British nation! It is little better than a dog-kennel; and therein, during the winter of 1837, I saw the shipwrecked crews of the Lyra, Trio, and Midas, three English merchantmen lost in the Black Sea, shivering with cold, badly fed, scarcely covered with decent clothing, and almost without beds, when the snow was some feet deep in many parts of the capital. I visited this hospital not alone, and can by witnesses substantiate, if necessary, more than I have set down. Other nations are not so careless of the seamen—the French and Austrians especially."

MISS NIGHTINGALE.

The following letter, addressed by Mr. Sidney Herbert to Miss Nightingale, has been published:—

(Copy.)

"DEAR MISS NIGHTINGALE,—You will have seen in the papers that there is a great deficiency of nurses at the hospital at Scutari. The other alleged deficiencies—namely, of medical men, lint, sheets, &c.—must, if they have really ever existed, have been remedied ere this, as the number of the medical officers with the army amounted to one to every 95 men in the whole force, being nearly double what we have ever had before; and 30 more surgeons went out there three weeks ago, and must by this time, therefore, be at Constantinople. A further supply went on Monday, and a fresh batch sail next week. As to medical stores, they have been sent out not only in profusion, but by the ton weight; 15,000 pair of sheets; medicines, wines, arrowroot, in the same proportion; and the only way for accounting for the deficiency at Scutari, if it exists, is that the mass of the stores went to Varna, and had not been sent back when the army left for the Crimea; but four days would have remedied that. In the meanwhile stores are arriving. But the deficiency of female nurses is undoubted, none but male nurses having ever been admitted to military hospitals. It would be impossible to carry about a large staff of the female nurses with an army in the field. But, at Scutari, having now a fixed hospital, no military reason exists against their introduction; and I am confident they might be introduced with great benefit, for hospital orderlies must be very rough hounds, and most of them, on such an occasion as this, very inexperienced ones. I receive numbers of offers from ladies to go out, but they are ladies who have no conception of what an hospital is, nor of the nature of its duties; and they would, when the time came, either recoil from the work, or be entirely useless, and consequently, what is worse, entirely in the way; nor would those ladies probably even understand the necessity, especially in a military hospital, of strict obedience to rule, &c.

"Lady Maria Forester (Lord Roden's daughter) has made some proposal to Dr. Smith, the head of the army medical department, either to go with, or to send out, trained nurses. I apprehend she means from Fitzroy-square, John-street, or some such establishment. The Rev. Mr. Hume, once chaplain to the General Hospital at Birmingham (and better known as the author of the scheme for transferring the City churches to the suburbs), has offered to go out himself as chaplain, with two daughters and twelve nurses. He was in the army seven years, and has been used to hospitals, and I like the tone of his letter very much. I think from both of these offers practical effects may be drawn.

"But the difficulty of finding nurses who are at all versed in their business, is probably best known to Mr. Hume; and Lady Maria Forester probably has not tested the willingness of the trained nurses to go, and is incapable of directing or ruling them. There is but one person in England that I know of who would be capable of organising and superintending such a scheme, and I have been several times on the point of asking you, hypothetically, if, supposing the attempt were made, you would undertake to direct it. The selection of the rank and file of nurses will be very difficult; no one knows that better than yourself. The difficulty of finding women equal to a task, after all, full of horror, and requiring, besides knowledge and good will, perseverance, and great courage, will be great; the task of ruling and introducing system among them great; and not the least will be the difficulty of making the whole work smoothly with the medical and military authorities out there. That it is, which makes it so important that the experiment should be carried out by one with administrative capacity and experience. A number of sentimental, enthusiastic ladies, turned loose into the hospital of Scutari, would probably after a few days be vises à la porte by those whose business they would interrupt, and whose authority they would dispute. My question simply is, would you listen to the request to go out and supervise the whole thing? You would, of course, have plenary authority over all the nurses; and I think I could secure you the fullest assistance and co-operation from the medical staff; and you would also have an unlimited power of drawing on the Government for whatever you think requisite for the success of your mission. On this part of the subject the details are too many for a letter, and I reserve it for our meeting; for, whatever decision may take, I know you will give me every assistance and advice. I do not say one word to press you. You are the only person who can judge for yourself which of conflicting or incompatible duties is the first or the highest; but I think I must not conceal from you that upon your decision will depend the ultimate success or failure of the plan. Your own personal qualities, your knowledge, and your power of administration and, among greater things, your rank and position in society—give you advantages in such a work which no other person possesses. If this succeeds, an enormous amount of good will be done now, and to persons deserving everything at our hands; and which will multiply the good to all time. I hardly like to be sanguine as to your answer. If it were yes, I am certain Mrs. Bracebridge would go with you, and give you all the comforts you would require, and which her society and sympathy only could give you. I have written very long, for the subject is very near my heart. Liz is writing to Mrs. Bracebridge to tell her what I am doing. I go back to town to-morrow morning. Shall I come to you between three and five? Will you let me have a line at the War Office to let me know? There is one point which I have hardly a right to touch upon, but I trust you will pardon me. If you were inclined to undertake the great work, would Mr. and Mrs. Nightingale consent? This work would be so national, and the request made to you proceeding from the Government, which represents the nation, comes at such a moment, that I do not despair of their consent. Deriving your authority from the Government, your position would ensure the respect and consideration of everyone, especially in a service where official rank carries so much weight. This would secure you any attention and comfort on your way out there, together with a complete submission to your orders. I know these things are a matter of indifference to you except as far as they may further the great object you would have in view; but they are of importance in themselves, and of every importance to those who have a right to take an interest in your personal position and comfort. I know you will come to a right and wise decision. God grant it may be one in accordance with my hopes!

"Believe me, dear Miss Nightingale, ever yours,
"Oct. 15. "SIDNEY HERBERT."

BRITISH HOSPITAL AT SCUTARI.

Applications from candidates desirous of acting as nurses to the British general hospitals in the East having been made erroneously to some of the public offices, we are requested to state that such applications should be addressed only to the Comptess of Shaftsbury, 24, Grosvenor-square; to Miss Stanley, 6, Grosvenor-terrace; or to the Hon. Mrs. Herbert, 49, Belgrave-square, who will at once attend to them.

GOVERNMENT ARRANGEMENTS FOR RECEIVING NEWS FROM THE EAST.

A few days ago we directed attention to the imperfect or no use made by Government of the telegraphic lines, by which early intelligence might be received from the Euxine. A correspondent who has great practical experience exposes in the following letter the inadequate use made of the means of postal despatch which Government possesses in their steamers:—

Oct. 20.

The time occupied in conveying mails via Marseilles, Malta, and Constantinople, to and from Sebastopol, ought not to exceed nine days. I have taken a London newspaper to Constantinople in nine days from its date, although the steamer I was on board of was detained a whole day at Malta, and another at Syra. It is, therefore, quite easy to convey mails to Constantinople in seven or eight days from London. From Constantinople to Sebastopol can be reached in twenty-six hours. The time required to bring a mail from Sebastopol to England will always be less in consequence, of the prevailing winds and current down from the Black Sea. It is quite within the bounds of probability that mails may be brought from Sebastopol to England in eight days. If the Banshee, Caradoc, Emperor, or any other of the fast steamers, had been sent off, under the command of an active man, immediately after the battle of the Alma, the news might have been in London on the 20th.

For years past steamers have been frequently sent from Constantinople, on the most frivolous occasions, and regardless of expense, to overtake the French packet at Syra. They have again and again been sent with despatches which might have been got ready in time for the sailing of the packet, or which might very well have been kept back till the next. Besides this employment of extra war steamers when there was no important or urgent news to forward, there have always been a great number of Foreign-office messengers continually on the road, carrying despatches backwards and forwards. And now that there is news of importance to be sent from the East—now that there are urgent instructions to be sent off to the East—not a steamer fit for the work can be spared. The first intelligence of the battle of the Alma is transmitted by a merchant steamer, and not till five days after the action is a Government officer sent off in a Government steamer.

The blame rests with a high authority; certainly not the Admiral.

An attempt has been made to throw blame on Lord Stratford de Redcliffe for not sending the Nil direct. The Nil is a French steamer belonging to a French company, over whom Lord de Redcliffe could have no authority.—Daily News.

INTELLIGENCE BY STEAMERS, COURIERS, AND TELEGRAPHS, FROM THE CRIMEA.

It is satisfactory to know that an arrangement has been made, in conjunction with the French Government, for the despatch of a steamer every second day from the Crimea for Varna. From Varna a corps of mounted couriers will convey the intelligence to Kronstadt, in Transylvania, whence the electric telegraph is laid on to Vienna. The distance from the Crimea to Varna can be done in forty-eight hours, something like the distance to Constantinople; but from Varna to Kronstadt is much shorter than from Constantinople to Belgrade, where the telegraph ends in that direction. When Constantinople was the centre of intelligence, it was arranged that steamers should leave Constantinople six times a month, or once in every five days, for Marseilles; and six steamers a-month left Marseilles with mails for Constantinople. The French and English Governments sent steamers alternately either way. Those have sometimes failed, from various causes. Indeed, of late, the French steamers were required for the conveyance of troops; and, although there have been several extra steamers passing and repassing along this route, the communications have been very irregularly kept up. It is most unjust to compare our delay in intelligence with that received at St. Petersburg, and transmitted westward from that city by the electric telegraph. St. Petersburg is reached by the old semaphore from the Crimea in two days, and intelligence is sent from St. Petersburg to Berlin, and thence to London and Paris, in a few hours. The new arrangements will meet the natural impatience of the public as nearly as possible, though they cannot keep up with the intelligence transmitted to the capital of Russia by the means already established in its own dominions.

LETTERS ABOUT THE ARMY IN THE CRIMEA.

Balaklava, 18th October.

I have arrived at this little village, and found that all the troops were fast getting under arms to repulse an attack of the enemy. The fact is, we have been expecting such an attack for some days past, and for that reason Sir Colin Campbell has been left commanding the garrison. The latter has been further strengthened by the addition of 8,000 Turks, all the English and French cavalry, two additional batteries of artillery, and 600 marines: altogether, the force to protect this place can be little short of 15,000 men. All the heights which command the approach across the valley to the village of Balaklava have been strongly entrenched, and some of the heaviest ships' guns mounted in redoubts. The enemy would have to storm and capture nearly forty such earthworks before they would be in a position to attack our infantry on the hills, so that I think we are pretty safe. It is a matter of paramount importance to us, not only that Balaklava itself should be retained, but that our communications with it should be perfectly free and uninterrupted. The knowledge of its importance to us will of course induce the enemy to attack us, and I believe we shall yet have a bloody battle of Balaklava.—M. H.

Camp, Sebastopol.

A TURK IS EVERY INCH A SOLDIER; cats whatever is given him, obeys without a murmur, works like a horse, marches till he drops, draws his own water, cuts his own wood, ties his horse to a tree, and sleeps on the ground, without moving a muscle of his face, or giving the smallest sign of impatience. The contempt with which the Austrian officers affect to treat such men as these is ridiculous in the extreme—as if good-fitting clothes and well-shaven cheeks were the main elements in the composition of an army. The fact is, that the Turks have all the leading military virtues in a greater degree, I firmly believe, than any people in the world; and if officered as they ought to be, and armed as they ought to be, might once again make Europe tremble.

On the 13th and 14th October, 4,000 fresh Turkish troops arrived from Stambul, and proceeded to the right front of the position of Balaklava, where they are making batteries for the defence of that position. It was easy to see that these Turks were from Constantinople, for more than usual care had been bestowed on their outfit. They had all warm winter clothing, and they were moreover provided with tents. The troops that accompanied us from Bulgaria are still in their summer dress, have no tents, and are compelled to sleep in the open air.

Oct. 14.—Heavy fog. Great progress made in the batteries last night, and a large quantity of ammunition carried up.

10 a.m.—A large party of the enemy, supported by a considerable force in rear, is observed coming up the ravine which runs on the left of the Second Division towards the upper part of the town. A picket of the 49th Regiment is surrounded in a house in the ravine, and the sergeant made prisoner. The rest of the picket escape and give the alarm. Two pickets, one of the 23rd Regiment, and one of the Rifle Brigade, hasten to the attack, and succeed in driving the Russians back, but not until they had eaten the dinners of the 49th picket, which they found in the house. During the skirmish the sergeant of the 49th escapes. Several of the Russians are wounded, and one, who was at the time carrying off a 49th knapsack, is killed in a personal encounter with a rifleman. One of the 23rd is wounded mortally. One Russian, wounded and made prisoner, states that the force was commanded by a general officer, and that its object was to reconnoitre, and also to fetch water. It was suspected that they were trying to find out where our powder magazine—the casks of which they might have observed our sailors carrying—was placed. It is in a cave, and quite secure from observation or fire from the town. The troops were turned out ready for a more general attack, but were not required. Several rifles taken from the Russians on this occasion were found to be of the kind known as the needle gun, and bore the mark of being manufactured at Liege. A broad, double-edged, short sword was also carried by each of the Russians.—D. N.

Oct. 16.—Some French officers mention that five of their men who had been taken prisoners have managed to escape, two Zouaves, and three of the 6th regiment of the line. They describe that there is a great want of water in the town, and that the troops are receiving rations of wine three times a day as a substitute for it. An announcement is made to the English through the commissariat that the French have been baking bread, and wish to present every English officer and soldier with a loaf.—D. N.

BALAKLAVA.—Our London letters up to 27th September reached us on the night of the 16th October, and again on the 17th October another batch came to hand up to the 3rd October, by which we see that our movements here are duly chronicled. Letters are always acceptable; we require something of the kind when we retire to our "downies," or rather lodgings on the ground floor; and we heartily thank you for all and for everything sent in the shape of news from England.

USE OF A PLAID IN BATTLE.—A letter was received a few days ago by a draper at Inverness, in which occurs the following curious circumstance:—"The big rough plaid which we got some time ago for Captain Campbell, 23rd Regiment, saved his life at the Alma, as he found several balls in it after he was carried off the field on the 20th September."—Edinburgh Courier.

INTERPRETERS WITH THE ARMY OF THE EAST.

To the Editor of the Daily News.

Sir,—Why should there a Greek spy on the staff with our army in the Crimea? Were there not English gentlemen thoroughly conversant with the Turkish and other eastern languages, eminently qualified for the post called "Dragoman," who offered their services, and were rejected in favour of a traitorous Greek?—I am, &c.

MISCELLANEOUS ANECDOTES, INCIDENTS, AND MEMORANDA.

OUR BATTERIES ARE PLACED SO NEAR SEBASTOPOL that we can hear distinctly the church bells, the tunes played by the bands (the other day they played "God save the Queen"), the howling of the dogs, and the crowing of vigilant cocks, so that a body of Russian riflemen, inclined for close quarters, have only to creep quietly towards our works, and they are forthwith gratified. On Saturday, Oct. 14, about 150 of the enemy came up a ravine, at the bottom of which were twelve men and a sergeant stationed to keep close watch in a small house, which would have afforded a determined party good protection for a volley or two, after which a speedy retreat would have been but an act of prudence. The sergeant of the party took a more cautious view of the matter, and considered that running away, without disturbing the enemy, would secure him from the fire of rifle-men still at a goodly distance from the house. Acting upon this reasoning, away he went, leaving behind him all the knapsacks, that the flight might be unimpeded. This fatal and cowardly conduct might have been attended by serious results; for the Russians, finding no opposition, were enabled to steal to the rear of the battery. Fortunately, one of our soldiers saw them, and gave the alarm, upon which an officer of the Rifles at once gallantly called to twelve of his corps to follow him. Away they went, of course, supported as soon as possible by others, and the 150 Russians retreated before them very steadily. Now it was that a terrible, but interesting, conflict took place between the tallest man of the 2nd battalion of Rifles and a huge Russian rifleman. Hannan, an Irishman, noted at the Cape for his rashness, rushed forward and fired. The shot was returned, and a second shot attempted by his opponent, but fortunately a exp could not be found. Seeing this, Hannan rushed up, and with his fist knocked the Russian over a low wall, and leaped after him. The two now grappled, and a dreadful struggle followed, in which, at last, our soldier was worsted; and a short sword was in the air to give him his death-blow—nay, more, its point was through the trousers, and about to penetrate the thigh and bowels—but, ere the thrust was given, a shot from Hannan's comrade and friend, Ferguson, pierced the heart of the sturdy Russian, and he fell lifeless by the side of his intended victim. We lost in this affair only one killed, and two wounded. Of the enemy, three were brought in wounded, several remained dead on the field, and others were carried off into Sebastopol.

WHEN THE ALLIED FLEETS attacked Sebastopol on the 17th of October nothing could be more noble than the gallant way in which the Agamemnon and Sanspareil steamed in amid a perfect hail of cannon-balls and shells, preceded by a little tug-steamer, the Circassia (or Shark), commanded by Mr. Ball. This little bit of a cockleshell, which looked as if she might have been arrested by a fowling-piece, deliberately felt the way for the large ships till her services were no longer required. At sunset, at the close of the action, the change was magic from a hot sun, mist, smoke, explosions, shot, shell, rockets, and the roar of 10,000 guns—to a still, cool, brilliant starlight sky, looking down upon a glassy sea, reflecting in long tremulous lines the lights at the mastsheads of the ships retreating seaward amid profound silence. Three of our ships were roughly handled, and the killed and wounded amounted to 46 English killed and upwards of 250 wounded. Lieutenant Chase, of the Albion, has fallen, and Mr. Foster, midshipman on board the Sanspareil, is seriously wounded. No captives have been hit. The blue jackets showed all their ancient valour. Eight or nine men were swept away at a forecastle gun on board the Sanspareil by the explosion of a shell. The two remaining men coolly went on loading, with their sponge and rammer, as though nothing had happened. The sight of the squadrons when first approaching the port of Sebastopol, and arriving within range of the forts, was one of the most imposing which one could possibly witness. Some of the liners, observed from the starboard side, bid their tiny propellers so completely that the huge masses seemed to move by themselves. If this was the most imposing sight, the most exciting was that when the first shot was fired by the enemy. It was as if an electric spark was running through the crews. There was a perfect fury for firing, and the greatest difficulty was to make the men cease, as was at times necessary when one or another of the allied vessels was in the way. A great inconvenience in working the guns was experienced from the absence of so many men at the naval brigade ashore, especially in the ships from which some of the superior officers had gone to the camp. Several of the liners could not work their upper-deck guns in consequence. [Why not send out by steamer some of the Baltic Fleet blue jackets from Spithead?]

WHEN THE FLEETS attacked Sebastopol the French commenced first, at about six p.m., and in less than an hour their fort was blown up, totally disabled, which, says a correspondent, "has had the effect of preventing them taking any great part in to-day's bombardment. The fire from the enemy has been terrific, and ours equal. About two p.m., the shipping of the combined fleets commenced on the outside forts at the entrance of the harbour, and such fearful firing on both sides I should think was hardly ever before witnessed. The different tiers of guns from the forts was quite equal to our broadsides. The ships must have suffered severely. At three p.m. one of the principal magazines of the enemy blew up, and the cloud must have been more than a mile in circumference. It was from an eighty gun fort; but, fancy, in less than forty minutes they had several guns blazing away at us again. One of our magazines, or ammunition waggons, with four horses and driver, was blown to atoms by a shell from the enemy. One of the Lancaster guns has burst, and killed six hands. The naval brigade has suffered from a continual cross fire, and in the early part of the day Captain Peel was wounded slightly in the face, a lieutenant of the Leander killed, and five men. At half-past three the French opened again, and at five they had a second magazine blown up, but I could not ascertain the extent of damage sustained. The naval brigade has two post captains and two commanders attached. The valleys near the entrenchments are quite paved with shot and shell from the enemy. The doctor of the 68th was cut in two by a shot, and an assistant surgeon belonging to a ship, who was a spectator, was killed. One of the sailors passed me on a stretcher, with his arm taken off, singing, 'God save the Queen.'"

MONDAY NIGHT, the 16th of October, was an anxious time. As if the enemy anticipated the coming struggle of the 17th, and reserved their strength for the following day, we were but slightly annoyed by their fire during the night. A deserter who came over to us that evening, however, imagined a very different reason for the slackness of the Russian batteries. He said that all the officers of the garrison were that evening giving a grand ball to the inhabitants of Sebastopol, and that it was attended by all the leading ladies and gentlemen in the town. He said also that both town and garrison are perfectly certain of success, and of repulsing all our attacks within a fortnight; their earthworks and batteries he knew were powerful, and General Linders, who commands in chief, was daily expecting news of the advent of an immense body of troops. The statements of these deserters may well be open to doubt, but this fellow appears to have told the truth. Certainly, from whatever cause it arose, the enemy tired little that night, though one shot did ample mischief, killing Captain Evelyn Rowley, of the Grenadier Guards. They were relieving the guard on the works, and Captain Rowley was lying under cover at the time, but a shot struck a large stone behind him, and came back on him, killing him on the spot.

CAPTAIN PEEL (Diamond) has much distinguished himself, and threw a Russian 8-inch shell over the parapet of his battery, which burst harmlessly on the other side.

AN OFFICER OF H.M.S. BRITANNIA writes—"We were ordered not to fire before orders were given to begin from on deck. I had charge of eight of the heaviest guns, stood on the ladder, and waited for the word. At last it came. I tried to keep cool, but could not help getting a little excited, and sung out, 'Now, you beggars, let them have it.' And then began the row, which lasted till we could not see, and has left us all as deaf as beetles and as thirsty as camels."

THE SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT of the Morning Herald says:—"Conspicuous among the din could be plainly heard the Lancaster guns. Their sharp crack, different from the other heavy guns, was like that of a rifle among muskets. But the most singular effect was produced by its ball, which rushed through the air with a noise and regular beat, precisely like the passage of a rapid express train at a few yards distance. This peculiarity excited shouts of laughter among our men, who instantly nicknamed it the express train; and only by that name is the gun known. The effect of the shot seemed most terrible. From its deafening noise, the ball could be distinctly traced by the ear to the spot where it struck, when stone or earth alike went down before it. A battery of twenty or thirty such guns would destroy Sebastopol in a week. Unfortunately, from a short supply of ammunition, we can only afford to mount two, and even those are only fired once in eight minutes."

LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

NEXT MAIL FOR THE EAST.

Letters for the Black Sea and Malta will be despatched by the Hannibal, 90, screw steamship, from Devonport, on the 13th inst.; and by the Curagon, 30, screw steam frigate, Captain Hon. George F. Hastings, from Portsmouth, on the same date.

THE SIEGE OF SEBASTOPOL.

(By Submarine and British Telegraph).

THE ATTACK ON BALAKLAVA.

We have received from a correspondent at Marseilles the following despatch, which had reached that port by the French post steamer (Thabor), which left Constantinople on the 30th ult.:

"A correspondent in the army before Sebastopol writes on the 28th that 607 light infantry were engaged in the affair of the 25th, and that only 193 returned.

"Eight hundred cavalry were engaged, of whom only 200 returned.

"Nine officers were killed, 21 wounded, and 4 were missing.

"The 17th Lancers were almost destroyed.

"We require reinforcements."

We are enabled to announce that the Adelaide and Brandon, hired screw-steamships, have already been ordered to proceed immediately to Portsmouth, where they are to embark the following troops, who have been ordered to assemble at Portsmouth garrison for immediate embarkation, to join the headquarters of their respective regiments in the Crimea and seat of war in the East:—

	Officers.	Non-Commissioned Officers and Men.
Groundier Guards	1	121
Scots Fusiliers	1	52
1st Foot (1st battalion)	1	81
4th Foot	1	82
19th Foot	1	10
20th Foot	0	51
28th Foot	1	18
1st Foot	0	91
44th Foot	1	51
46th Foot	1	44
49th Foot	0	51
88th Foot	1	102
11th Brigade (1st battalion)	1	51
Total	9	792

A gentleman of Bristol was informed from the Horse Guards last week, in answer to an application for a commission in the army for his son, that there already 1,200 names on the list. Before the war there were not more than 100 names registered.

"VIENNA.

"According to authentic advices of the 28th ult. from Balaklava, a council of war was held on the preceding day, when it was resolved not to attempt to storm Sebastopol until the effect of the siege guns had been fairly tried.

"It is considered highly probable that a battle will be fought with the Russians under General Liprandi before Sebastopol is stormed.

"The Russian reinforcements are estimated at 30,000 men."

"VIENNA, Friday Evening.

"The following must be received with the greatest caution:—

"CERNOWITZ, Nov. 9.

"A most violent attack has been made on Sebastopol.

"There was a conflagration in the town, which the garrison could not extinguish.

"Prince Menschikoff had demanded an armistice of twelve hours, which was refused."

PARIS, Friday Evening.

The Minister of War has received the following telegraphic despatch from General Cranrobert, dated Oct. 28:—

"The siege works continue. On the 25th the Russian army showed itself on the plains of Balaklava; there had been no serious engagement, but the English cavalry has sustained some loss, owing to a charge pushed too far against the enemy.

"On the 26th, 5,000 men of the garrison made a sortie against the left wing of the English. This attack was repulsed, and the enemy thrown back into the place with considerable loss."

The Journal de St. Petersburg of the 2nd contains Prince Menschikoff's report of the affair at Balaklava. After describing the capture of four redoubts and eleven guns from the Turks by General Liprandi's force, it proceeds to say:—

"The English cavalry, commanded by Lord Cardigan, now came up and charged with extraordinary impetuosity the Hussar Brigade of the 6th Cavalry Division; but, taken in flank by four squadrons of the combined regiment of Lancers of the reserve, and thrown back on the cross fire of the guns of the 12th and 16th infantry divisions, which fired grape, the enemy suffered considerable loss.

"At the same moment that it attacked our Hussars the English cavalry also charged at full gallop the heavy guns of the Don battery, No. 3, where some artillerymen were sabred.

"Our loss in infantry does not exceed 300 killed and wounded. The loss of the cavalry and artillery is not yet known, even by approximation.

"The loss of the enemy is not known, but we have taken about 60 English prisoners, among whom are one superior officer and two ensigns.

"Of the four redoubts taken from the enemy, two will be immediately destroyed and two more strongly fortified, in order to enable us to hold this important position, from which we can act on the village of Kadekoi, through which the road passes, which leads from Balaklava to the enemy's camp."

Orders have been given for the immediate embarkation at Marseilles and Toulon of two divisions for the Crimea. These two divisions would amount to about 30,000 men. It was rumoured some six or seven days ago that the question of altogether withdrawing the army from the Crimea was mooted by one of the Ministers during a Cabinet Council. This rumour has been repeated to-day, and the name of the Minister, who is not unlikely to have suggested such a measure, mentioned. The Emperor at once cut the matter short, and stopped the mouth of the Minister by declaring that, if necessary, he would send 100,000 men more rather than give up Sebastopol.

It is said that the amount of reinforcements reported to have reached the Russian headquarters is very considerable. There is nothing extraordinary in the fact of the Russians receiving reinforcements, seeing that Perekop is still open to them. Why that door has not been shut up is not satisfactorily explained. Whether the shallowness of the water prevents ships from reaching close to the shore, or that the allied army could not afford to detach a sufficient force to that point, we know not, but it is certain that as long as Perekop lies open the Russian army can be constantly reinforced.

"Vienna.

"The Oest. Correspondenz states that the total loss at Balaklava, up to the 28th of October, is estimated at 5,000 Russians and 1,500 allies.

"According to a Turkish bulletin, which requires confirmation, there have been disturbances in Sebastopol on the part of the people, who wished to surrender.

"On the 30th the Banshee brought news to Constantinople that the cannonade was violent on both sides, but without decisive effect, although the damage done was great.

"On the 25th all the guns taken from the Turks were recaptured, with the exception of three.

"In Asia, the Turks in Kars and the Russians in Teflis had gone into winter quarters.

"Austria seems inclined to compromise matters, if possible."

"St. Petersburg, Thursday.

"Prince Menschikoff reports that up to the 3rd of November, in the evening, the siege operations of the allies continued without any visible result.

"The fire on the side of the English had become weaker.

"The damage done to the Russian works was considerable, and immediately repaired."

A despatch from St. Petersburg of the 2nd, received at Hamburg, announces that the Russian loss on the 25th at Balaklava, amounted to 5,500 men.

Vienna, Nov. 6.

We have no news. Three days have elapsed since the French and English Ministers received despatches from the Crimea.

RACING.

"On the green, great turf."

MR. EDITOR,—A filip being necessary to enliven the flag end of the racing season, a sudden onslaught was made by the police on a betting-house, known as "The Sun," in Long-acre, early in the afternoon of Tuesday last. All the males found on the premises, whether at the bar or in the rooms above, were at once captured, and shortly removed under a strong guard to the station in Bow-street. So large a body of prisoners—the number, it is stated, being upwards of a hundred—caused much sensation in the neighbourhood, and attracted a great crowd outside the police-court. As berths were not provided for such a stock of captives, they were mustered in the yard of the station-house, and there subjected to the delicate attentions of a search. Considerable sums of money were found on some of them, and sovereigns were inspected by constables after the style of the corn-dealers in Mark Lane, when they examine a handful of grain. The money, I hear, was returned, but the betting-books and other papers were detained for the sharp criticism of the F division. The parties were subsequently removed between a file of policemen, and amid the laughter and cheers of the lookers-on, conducted to the court opposite, which had to be cleared for their reception. The uproar might have been heard in Covent-garden market, and an old basket woman hurriedly quitted the spot impressed with the idea that the police had taken a body of the "Rooshians." The prisoners were finally liberated, after four hours' detention, upon entering into their own recognizances of £50 each to appear again on Tuesday next. The whole procedure savours of harshness; for a man who never made a bet in his life might enter the open doors of a licensed victualler in a leading thoroughfare, and before he finished the refreshment sought, find himself in "durance vile"—the personal annoyance, great as it must be, proving in all likelihood, a trifle to the probable injury to his character. Must it also be necessary, amid the throngs of visitors to the metropolis, for every stranger to make enquiries before he ventures to enter a shop for the purchase of a cigar? The betting list system was undoubtedly a nuisance and rightly suppressed, but a line must be drawn somewhere. At all events, let even-handed justice be done. While the Long-acre party was found, like the philosophical prince, "too much in the sun," the game was going on merrily in Jernyn-street, and at the well-known establishment adjoining Cheapside. If the authorities be determined to put a stop to all betting, let them march the police on Monday next to Hyde Park

Corner, and clear the yard and subscription-room at Tattersall's. The City of London, with its Stock Exchange, and other marts, would then enjoy the monopoly of all the gambling speculations of the day.

An amusing incident is said to have occurred during the proceedings at Bow-street. The Sifton Handicap was run for at Liverpool, on Tuesday, and for which Bra ken was made a great favourite, while several other horses were freely backed at short odds. On the result of the race becoming known in London, a boy, at some hazard, scrambled over the roofs of the contiguous houses, and, looking down on the assembled captives in the station-house yard, vociferated "The Gem!" The success of such an outsider was welcome news, and one delighted hook-maker shouted back—"The Gem! Then you're on, lay—a fiver to nothing."

There was some very fair sport at the Liverpool Autumn, though the Steeplechase, after what we have seen on the same ground, must be pronounced a failure. For the Croxteth Welter Cup, I gave you the winner in Alouca. The Sifton Handicap proved a surprise to all. My selected trio—and Bracken was not of the number—were starters, and though I did not send you the right horse, you had the stable that furnished the victress. I added too, that Alouca must be handy with the winner, and the son of Alpheus justified my confidence by finishing a good third. In the Tyro Handicap, I achieved the same position with Banbury. Fortune was more propitious to me in the Aintree Handicap, for Catherine Parr was my first named from a list of thirty-five. The Steeplechase requires no comment, Rosa, the half-bred, making a capital debut in a new line of business, and winning in a cawter. Needwood was second—his chance baffled, as I surmised, by the extra weight. The only other starters were Lincoln, Tom of Twaen, and Speculation. This is certainly not the way to mend matters.

Shrewsbury comes out in full feather next week with its Autumn Meeting of three days. There will be no lack of racing; for, in addition to the numerous items already advertised, we are to have a brace of new races, each for a £50 plate, to be entered for the night before running. The events already handicapped can boast of large entries, and the attempt at the present time to get any thing near the winners would seem very like a forlorn hope; but, as I presume you expect an opinion from me, you shall have it—quantum valuit.

THE SHREWSBURY HANDICAP, two miles and a quarter. This may be looked on as the principal feature of the meeting. There are fifty horses at all sorts of weights, with Defiance in the van. I am not prepared to see Jack Leeming come the old soldier over as a second time. Without hoping however, to touch the right one, I must express my liking for La Belle, Liberty, Pantomime, Gamelal, and Cudwick.

THE COPELAND NURSERY, ONE MILE.—Mrs. Rigby or Laura Selina may be found worthy to grace the head of this list of eighteen juveniles; but the 7st 7lbs may not prevent the Cock of the North from crowing lustily.

THE COLUMB HANDICAP, one mile and a quarter, has a nomination of no less a number than fifty-four. Catherine Parr, Cutsaw, and Master Slenley, arrest my attention among the middle weights, and The Jealous One must be my choice from the youngsters.

THE GRAND ANNUAL STEEPLCHASE. I feel myself here all abroad. Rosa may repeat her Liverpool victory, but, surely Trout, Labyrinth, and Diana, ought to have a chance, in the absence of Baytown and Miss Mowbray.

FOR THE HURDLE-RACE my choice must fall on Odium, Gaylad, and Tom Gurney.

THE ASTLEY HOUSE STAKES, to be entered for on Monday evening, become famous since the race was chosen for the first appearance of the unpareil Virgo. Here, last year, she was an indifferent fifth to Middlesborough! Can there be another such a clipper in the background? Yours, TOBY PERKS.

A good start being effected, Ted-lesley was the first off, followed by Phantom, Allebordello, Mr. Parr's two, Lina, Alp, Postulant, and Madame Laurence, in the order above named, past the stand, across the Cardiff road to the hill, approaching the summit of which the two leaders gave way, and the running was taken up by Allebordello. On re-appearing in clear, Allebordello had obtained a clear lead, which he maintained to the end, winning cleverly by a length. A good race for second with Tower and Lina, who singled themselves out on entering the distance, resulting in favour of Tower by half a length; the others followed at wide intervals, Madame Laurence, last throughout, bringing up the rear.

The Farmers' Stakes of 10 sovs, added to a Sweepstakes of 1 sov each.

In the course of the evening the winner was sold by auction for 50 guineas, and purchased by Charles Boyce, who subsequently christened him St. Hilary.

The Borough Stakes of 20 sovs, added to a Sweepstakes of 5 sovs each.

Tollbar, who was never in the race, beaten four lengths. There being no advance upon the selling price, the winner was not sold.

A Pony Race for a saddle, bridle, and whip, given by John King, Esq., of Cowbridge, for ponies not exceeding thirteen and a half hands high, each weight, one mile and a half, was won by Mr. Davies's br m Polly Brown, beating Mr. Bevan's gr m Squirrel, Mr. Rhy's br m The Express, Mr. J. Tanner's b g Deceptive, Mr. Shepherd's br m Tickle-me-Gently, Mr. M. Thomas's b g Telegraph, Mr. D. Thomas's b m Silvertail, Mr. Morgan Powell's ch g by Furan, and Mr. Driscoll's b m Squeeze-me-Tight.

THURSDAY.

The Grand Annual Steeplechase of 50 sovs, added to a Handicap Sweepstakes of 10 sovs each, 7 lb, and 3 only if declared. Four miles. 18 subs, 11 of whom paid £3 ft.

Mr. C. Boyce's br m Victress, by the Provost, aged 10st 4lb, 1000 yds 1
Mr. C. H. Rhy's b g Royalty, 6 yrs, 1st 4lb, 1000 yds 2
Mr. Power's b g St. David, 6 yrs, 9st 4lb, 1000 yds 3
Mr. Barnett's ch m Diana, 10st 1lb, 1000 yds 4

Betting—5 to 1 on Diana, 3 to 1 agst Victress, 4 to 1 agst Royalty, and 6 to 1 agst St. David. Royalty, followed by Victress, Diana, and St. David, led the way over the flight of hurdles opposite the stand, and to the first fence, at which Diana fell, and threw Stevens, who, however, soon regained his seat. At the third leap from the stand a low bank, faced with stubble, with a drop on the landing side, Diana, jumping short, again fell, threw Stevens very heavily, and injured one of his shoulders, so severely, that he was unable to proceed; the mare consequently was led home. Royalty still kept the lead, followed at a respectful distance by Victress (St. David being tailed-off a long way), until approaching the road which leads to the Moors, and crosses the course about half a mile to the left of the stand, when Victress gradually drew up, and deprived him of it. At the last jump, Royalty managed to get his head level with the old mare's, and was first over, but after a fine race with the two, Victress was landed the winner by a neck; St. David was tailed-off a long way.

The Hunt Steeplechase of 25 sovs, added to a Sweepstakes of 5 sovs each. Steeplechase course. 3 subs.

Mr. C. Boyce's br g St. Hilary (late Wait-a-While), by Wait-a-While, 5 yrs, 11st 7lb (inc 7lb extra) 1
Mr. Bower's b g Tollbar, aged, 11st 7lb (inc 7lb extra) 2
Mr. Ballard's b m Jezabel, aged, 11st 4lb (inc 4lb extra) 3

St. Hilary took the lead, followed by Tollbar and Jezabel, to the second field, when the rider of the latter broke one of his stirrup leathers, and was compelled to stop his mare. Some considerable time having elapsed before this was righted, he again set a-gallop, but with little chance of success, as the other two were at least a quarter of a mile in advance. The race admits of little description. St. Hilary, who maintained the lead throughout, being so far ahead at the finish that she actually walked in a couple of hundred yards before Tollbar, who beat the mare by six or eight lengths. On returning to scale an objection was made against St. Hilary; but it was subsequently withdrawn.

The Selling Steeplechase of 25 sovs, added to a Sweepstakes of 5 sovs each. Steeplechase course. 3 subs.

Mr. Power's b g Tollbar, aged, 10st 4lb, £200 1
Mr. Llewellyn's b m Patty, 5 yrs, 1st 10lb, £200 2
Mr. C. H. Rhy's b g Royalty, 12st 3lb, £200 3
Tollbar, followed by Patty and Royalty in the order named, took the fight of hurdles opposite the stand, in advance, and at the second fence Royalty (who had only been started to make up the number of runners to secure the added money) thinking he had gone quite far enough, refused, and was, thereupon, walked off the course to his stable. Tollbar then went on about a couple of fields in advance of Patty, and won easily. The winner was sold for 30 guineas, and goes into C. Boyce's stables.

Markets.

MONEY MARKET.

THURSDAY.—The English funds continue to show dulness, and have experienced another slight decline. Consols for money opened at the price to which they had receded after regular hours on Wednesday evening—namely $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{3}{4}$, and at the termination of business the quotations were $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{3}{4}$ for money, and $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{3}{4}$ for the December accounts. A partial demand for money was manifested, and 3 per cent. was paid for loans on Government securities; but, with this exception, there was nothing to exercise any adverse effects on the market. Bank Stock left off at 211 to 212½. Reduced, 22½ to 23; New Three per Cents, 22½ to 23½; Long Annuities, 42; India Stock, 231 to 231½; India Bonds, 11s. to 11½; and Exchange-bills, 6s. to 6s. premium.

FRIDAY.—Consols closed very heavy, at 22½ to 23½ for both money and account. Reduced 3 per Cents, have fallen to 22½; New 3 per Cents, have rallied to 23. Long Annuities, 42½ to 43½. The other English securities are unchanged.

SATURDAY.—Consols for money, 22½ to 23½; ditto for 7th December 23 to 23½.

MARK LANE.

FRIDAY.—Fresh up to-day the arrivals of English wheat were very limited. The demand ruled active, at an advance on Monday's prices of 2s. per qr. In some instances fine qualities were even dearer. Foreign wheat, the imports of which continue very limited, was in request, and is to 2s. per quarter dearer. Barley, sold readily at very full prices. We had a limited supply of oats on sale. Good heavy corn was 6d. per quarter dearer, and other qualities firm. Beans, peas, and flour, sold steadily, at very full prices.

COUNTRY GRAIN.

Ipswich, November 7.—We have only a limited supply of wheat. Sales are made directly samples are offered, and an advance fully established of 5s. per quarter. Of barley we have a fair supply; a great demand appears to exist for it, and, contrary to expectation, and to the London market reports, it is sold readily, and an advance since this day week of 2s. to 3s. per quarter is paid. Other grains as of late. We quote prices to the growers: Wheat, red, 74s. to 78s.; ditto, white, 80s. to 81s. per quarter; barley, malting, 35s. to 35½s.; ditto, grinding, 32s. to 33s. per quarter; beans, 48s.; peas, 46s. per quarter. Averages for the week ending Nov. 4: Wheat, 1,046 quarters, at 71s. 8d.; barley, 1,453 quarters, at 34s. 11d.; beans, 20 quarters, at 48s. 6d.; peas, 43 quarters, at 44s. 1d.

SUNDERLAND, November 4.—The supply of grain this day was large, and the quality good. Trade opened firm, but sellers were obliged to give way a little towards the close of the market. Best white wheat fetched 80s.; red ditto, 70s. to 75s.; seed ditto, 84s. per quarter barley, 34s. to 40s.; oats, 30s. to 31s. per quarter; flour, 50s. to 56s. per sack.

SMITHFIELD.

FRIDAY.—The supply of beasts was but moderate, and in very inferior condition. Most breeds moved off steadily at full prices. We were scantily supplied with sheep, in which a fair business was transacted, at extreme rates. The best old Downs were worth 5s. per 8lbs. Calves were brisk, and 2d. per 8lbs. dearer. The top figure was 3s. per 8lbs. The pork trade was firm, at full currencies. Milch cows were dull, at from £14 to £19 each, including their small calf.

NEWGATE AND LEADENHALL.

FRIDAY.—The demand for each kind of meat was steady, at full prices.

COUNTRY CATTLE.

TURF TALK.

"The chosen sport of a great and a free people."
OUR SAILOR KING.

REVIEW OF THE TURF SEASON 1854.—No. 1.

We shall not torture our patrons with a voluminous retrospect of the business of the campaign now waning to a close, or insult their powers of memory with a ridiculous recapitulation of those matters which are necessarily fresh upon their mind; but endeavour rather to offer a review that may be acceptable for its succinctness, novelty, and interest—giving the reader a faithful idea of the success of the different meetings, and the extent to which the sport is encouraged.

FEBRUARY.

The campaign opened on the 1st at NEWTON-LE-WILLOWS, where Defiance, 4 yrs, 8st 7lb, and Royal George, 5 yrs, 8st 12lb, ran a dead heat for the Trial Stake of £10; seventeen ran for a Handicap Plate of £70, and seven two-year-olds were mustered for the Golborne Stakes of £65. Each of these events was singularly interesting in itself, although of little general importance as affected the future. Truegirl, by the aid of Mansfield Frost, her old pilot, who is a Triton among the minnows of the leather-flapping sphere, gained the two heats races, for each of which she was entered to be sold for a ten-pound note, and was bought in at 50 and 40 guineas respectively.—Mr. Topham benefitting £18 17s. by the competition. DERBY was more noted for the number of its "jumpers" than for the extent of flat-race competition afforded. The enterprising committee benefitting £74 10s.

by the sale of Free Trader (late John Bright), who had been entered for 20 sovs. LINCOLN gave us the first meeting of any import; still, nothing particular transpired. Nevertheless, it was the best gathering of the month. The Spring Handicap, which fell an easy prey to Georgy, was worth £220; and the four-year-old Sam swept away a brace of selling stakes on the first day, being bought in at 57 guineas in one instance, and sold for 77 guineas in the other, the new executive realising £80. 14s. clear. Passing over the Harrow spurt, we come to the Nottingham tryst in amphitheatrical Sherwood, where Alonzo commenced his series of spring successes, beating a field of a dozen indifferent opponents for the principal handicap of £255. There were three selling races, and Red Rose, 3 yrs (30 sovs), was bought in at 100 guineas; Julien, 5 yrs (20 sovs), went for 35 guineas and President, 5 yrs (20 sovs), for forty-one guineas—the Forest Fund netting £114. 16s.

This month being the avant courier only was necessarily FISHING STATIONS. No. 9.—RUISLIP RESERVOIR.—DRAWN BY T. H. WILSON.

RUISLIP RESERVOIR is easily accessible by rail from Euston-square to Pinner Station, and from thence by flies generally in readiness. Next summer a branch line will be opened from West Drayton to Uxbridge (on the Great Western Railway), which is within three and a half miles of the water. The Reservoir is about eighty acres in extent; and, surrounded as it is by the extremely pastoral scenery peculiar to the district, and rich woolly hills fringing the banks, may be compared for beauty with the lakes of Cumberland. It is well preserved, and the angler for jack, tench, or perch, in favourable weather, may be certain of good sport and heavy fish. Mr. Adams, of Birmingham, came from there expressly to try the water, and in one day and a half killed thirteen fish, weighing 79lb. 10oz. Tench have been taken of 5lb. weight, and very large perch—one weighed 5lb. 10oz. The host of the George Inn at Ruislip is most attentive, and reasonable in his charges. There is a house, the Six Hills, within 200 yards of the water, where a dinner is provided on Sundays, and every attention paid to anglers who can only avail themselves of this day; but, owing to a fear of the Uxbridge magistrates, who do not consider anglers as travellers, and the threats of a summons held out by the police, the doors remain closed to all till one o'clock; however, breakfast or tea can be obtained at the cottage of Daniel Tompkins, who resides about fifty yards from the water.

devoid of any very "attractive metal." It, however, served to sharpen the appetite for what was in embryo.

The result of the five meetings may be thus briefly summed up:—

Meeting.	Days.	Stakes.	Horses.	Money.
Nottingham	1	7	55	£498
Derby	1	1	29	222
Lincoln	2	8	52	735
Harrow	1	2	7	118
Nottingham	2	11	50	848
Total	8	32	204	£1300

We must defer a dissection of the dozen meetings, extending over seventeen days, in March, till our "No. 2" article, which will also include a review of the April, May, and June transactions.

"Hark! what loud shouts
Re-echo through the groves—he breaks away—
Sbrill horns proclaim his flight; each struggling hound
Strains o'er the lawn to reach the distant pack,— Tis triumph all and joy —"

The run on Friday (yesterday) week with the above celebrated pack is certainly worthy of being recorded. They met at the village of St. Margaret's, in the midst of a very heavy shower of cold, misty, and cutting rain, which gave to the entire country round a cold and miserable appearance, the reverse of agreeable to the spectator, and infinitely more so to the individual himself.

Time being called, the deer-cart was sent forward, and a very pretty specimen of an active little fellow was ejected from its thraldom, in a large pasture field to the south-west of Kilsick House.

The hunt commenced at a merry pace, the entire field making towards Kilmachree, through several stubble fields, over ridge and furrow, up to the rattling wide and desperate double ditch which separates the lands of Ballystraham and Shallow. In steeplechase style they continued through the west of Corratown, wheeling gradually to the right, pointing for Chapelmidway, the fast and unchecking severity of the pace here causing a very perceptible diminution of the pinks. Forward, still forward they fly, passing through the broad pastures of Kilsicane, into the globe lands of Thornstown, out of them again, and over a deep and rapid flowing brook in the bottoms, bending rather suddenly with a wheel to the right, up to Mr. Cope's Well, through Castleferna, into the lands of "Boggyharry," up to Mount Stewart, through Kilsicore, to the cross roads of Listapel, into Roganstown, and finishing upon one of the farms of Peter Augier, Esq., called the Leas, a short distance from Rathfild House, where the deer was pulled, down, and before sufficient aid could arrive, dismembered and eaten, this being the second whoop of the season. Several of the field gallantly distinguished themselves throughout this sharp and checkless five-and-thirty minutes.

The same hounds met on the succeeding Monday at the Flat House. The field numbered about 100, and a prime red deer was enlarged about half a mile from the meet. After a quarter of an hour's "law," the hounds were "laid on." They ran to the Black Bull; then inclined to the right to the Fairy House; crossed the road, and from thence through Ballinfray, on to Butler's of Priesttown; over the hills of Kilbride, leaving the chapel to the right; through Ballymacarney, on to Gerrard's of the Bay, jumping the Lough; then bending to the left, across the Ashbourne road, through Kilshean-bottoms, and on to Harriestown; thence through Reilly's of Ballymun, on to Sir Conpton Donville's, crossing the Sundry road, through all the gentlemen's seats, and on to the Earl of Charlemont's demesne; then dropping into the road, taking a fourteen feet down jump at the Jesemine wall, crossed the gardens at the opposite side, and running out at the Clontarf railway arch, plunged into the sea, leaving the railway to the left and swimming across to the North-wall at the opposite railway arch; here the hounds headed and turned him; he then swam and ran back (the water being in parts shallow) towards the point at which he entered the water; but, before reaching the shore, the hounds overtook and drowned him. Amongst the few up at the finish were Charley and Byrne, the huntsman and whipper-in; Capt.

Chichester, 7th Dragoon Guards; Mr. Alley, and Cassidy, the horse-dealer, of James-street, Dublin; all of whom rode throughout as a hunt should be ridden.

THE BADSWORTH HOUNDS.

The Badsworth country presents the prospects of a season fully equal, if not superior, to any former year, and amply calculated to sustain its ancient renown. On the opening day, at Womersley, there was no deficiency of foxes in the adjacent covers; but, for satisfactory reasons, they were not forced with an unusual pressure; and although, under these circumstances, they only ran several smart rings, the sport was interesting, and just sufficient, with regard to the horses, to give their riders a taste of "the qualities of their pastures." The second meet, however, was more interesting. The hounds met at Marr Village, with a field of "the right sort." Owen threw them into Melton Wood; and speedily three or four foxes were on their pads, and equally on the alert. A little difficulty had to be encountered; but Owen selected one of his acquaintances, and having laid the hounds well on, he broke cover in the direction of Vicker's Holt and the Tunnili, as if shaping his course for Barnbrough; yet heading towards Hargman's Stone and St. Helen's Chapel, and thence to Melton Warren. But, not liking these quarters, he rounded the hill into Melton Park, and passed in front of the Hall, and so onwards to the top of Wildthorpe Cliff; thence to Cadeby, through the now churchyard. It was evident that Master Reynard had been "out late at night," and was "up to a trick or two;" for near Cadeby Rattles, the hounds were at fault, and for awhile they could not make him out. The hounds were then thrown into the Pot Ridings, and a few well-known notes announced a find. He presently showed his brush, and evidently meant mischief. He rushed into Sprotbrough Plantations; and then pointed his nose to Scabba Wood. But he shied that well-known habitation, and leaving the Brick-kiln Quarry on the left, crossed the Melton Road, as if determined to reach Burnt Wood; but he deployed to Malton Brand, and so on to Melton Wood, from whence the pack had at first snuffed the open. An unexpected check was here come to. The scent was bad and the hounds could not carry it, although the run was against the wind. From the spot just mentioned to this point, the run was delightful, the pace good, and the field well up, as well as the spirits of the horses. After a short time, through the tact of the huntsman, the scent was recanted. The fox broke away, and shaped his course to Melton Warren, and crossed the low-ground to Melton Mill. Being rather tightly pressed, and not liking the roar behind his brush, he sought refuge in a drain which runs beneath the road on the lower portion of Melton Hill on the margin of the Park. A rather long delay took place, which reminded some of the field of sandwich time. The drain was opened at each end; but several terriers refused to face him, and he declined to bolt. The water-course was then opened in the centre of the road; and, in order to give him a fair chance, the hounds were called off into the Park. Seizing the most favourable opportunity, he rushed out on the south side, and had sufficient "law" to ensure his own safety. Away he went, clear of the pack, and curved into the Park. The run over this ground was a cheerful breathing. Reaching the spot formerly used as a training-ground, the hounds were at fault for a few minutes. Owen harked the pack back, and soon recovered the scent, which the favorites seemed to carry better than before. Reaching Cadeby, he ran into a farm-yard and got under a shed. He was soon unkenelled, viewed onwards, and sought for security in a labourer's cottage. Ned, the first whip, dismounted and entered the place, closed the door, and soon brought him out in a whip-noose, and the hounds gave him his quietus. He was a remarkably fine fox; and one of that sort, which, had he escaped his enemies this time, would, on some future occasion, have showed them the road to Penistone. The brush was presented to Wm. Godson, Esq., of Sandall Grove.

WILTSHIRE.—Fox-hunting has commenced with tolerable success, so far as abundance of the "varmint" are concerned; but the ditches are still blind from green weeds, and trees and hedges are yet unstripped of their leaves, so that riding close to hounds is voted a bore, and most are content with an occasional glance at them, satisfied that at this early stage of the season every run will be only comparatively good. Mr. Asheton Smith's turn-out, both as regards horses and hounds, is very complete, and promises well for the hill and dale south-east of Devizes; and unless Will Loug's opinion is good for nothing, the Duke of Beaufort will show some excellent hunting in the inclosures north-west of this town. The Cavalier takes their old country, and the South Wilts provide for the district west and south of Warminster, so that this country is, at any rate, no worse than it has been. Hares are strong and in good wind. Mr. Tugwell's, with whom, as usual, condition is a sine qua non both as to horses and dogs, has had a few good bursts, but if a swim through eight yards of the canal by hare, hounds, and one or two horsemen, is excepted, no unusual incident has occurred. Lord Broughton's former pack of harriers, now in other hands, and supported by subscription, come out under the title of the "Vale of Wylye Harriers," and will rouse up that rich and pretty neighbourhood in a style not to be surpassed by any pack.—CURRENT JELLY.

MR. ASHETON SMITH'S HOUNDS.—On Tuesday last the meet was at Stowell Lodge; and at eleven o'clock about forty horsemen had assembled. The hospitable owner of the "Lodge," asked in, not only the gentlemen in pink, but the whole field, to partake of the substantial luncheon which had been laid out for them. At twelve o'clock the hounds were thrown into Draycott Wood, when a brace of foxes were soon on foot, and the field, after an excellent day's sport, separated.—Salisbury Journal.

HUNGERFORD.—The meeting of the Earl of Portsmouth's Hounds at Hungerford Park on the 3rd inst., excited an unusual degree of interest. There was a number of carriages early on the spot to witness the start; among the company were the Marchioness of Aylesbury and attendants, the Misses Shelly, of Elcott, T. Poynder, Esq., of Barton Court, and a vast assembly of persons on foot, who had a beautiful view of the fox across the park for a considerable distance. The morning was exceedingly fine and clear, which caused many to linger for the return of hounds.—Reading Mercury.

THE WESTMEATH HOUNDS.—This newly established pack of fox-hounds, under the mastership of Sir Richard Levinge, Bart., of Knockdrin Castle, have had their first two advertised "meets" at the respective seats of their two principal supporters: on November 1st at Ballynecall, the seat of J. W. Middleton Berry, Esq.; and on November 4th at Rosmeade, the seat of Lord Vaux, of Harrowden. On the first day the sport was altogether confined to covert-hunting, and the fox was at length, after a deal of worrying round and round the immense coverts of Knockdrin, run to ground in an earth which had not been known of before, and therefore not stopped. On the 4th, however, at Rosmeade, Ransom, the huntsman, had not thrown the hounds into cover two minutes before two or three old hounds "opening" gave intelligence that "the gentleman was at home," and from the straight way in which they went through the woods it was clear that he meant business. At first he pointed his head in the direction of the famed Meath Covert of Killallen; but afterwards bearing more to the right, he passed the plantations of Kilrush, and made towards the woods of Killua; soon, however, he changed his intention—only skirted Killua, and made for Drewstown; after crossing the wide pasture in that direction; he crossed the high road, and appeared to be making for a well-known sewer in the lauds of Friernmore. Finding himself, however, too hot to go in, he appeared to be steering for Oilltown, when he wheeled to the left and got into the hog covert at Drewstown, when Sir Richard Levinge, after a brilliant run of an hour and five minutes without a check, ordered the hounds to be called off, wishing to deal in the most gentleman-like way with the Meath country, about parts of which there have unfortunately been some disputes between the two hunts.

CARLOW AND ISLAND HOUNDS.—The Carlow and Island hounds met on Tuesday week, at Old Park, where a large field of sportsmen was in attendance. Some time was spent in drawing the plantations blank. The master then headed for Pollerton, where a fox was soon found, but unfortunately he ran to earth in a sewer about a mile from the covert. The next draw was Moorstown, where a magnificent fox broke and went away in gallant style, passing over a fine grass country, intersected with stiff fences; he also took refuge in a sewer beyond Johnstown. It was evident, from the few up at the finish, that the horses are not fit, at this early period of the season, to run so long and severe a hunt as that on Tuesday week.

A GOOD RUN WITH THE PUCKERINGHOE HOUNDS.—On Wednesday, 15th November, the meet was at Peveril's. Found at Rondywood; gave him one ring in the cover, then away at a tremendous pace over the stiff inclosures, to the end of Cronywood, leaving Mr. Dunsford's house on the left, then forward for Peveril's Wood, pointing for Dihdon Bent. He then turned to the right, and ran nearly to Shortgroves Park, but got headed; turned down to the Newport station, where he was again headed. He then crossed the Widdington Commons, as though he meant the high wood; but he again altered his course, turned to the right, went under the railroad, and up to Queendow Wood, where he beat us, at the end of a fine run of 54 minutes. Found the second fox at Arseywood; gave him two rings in the cover there; then away for Norman House; turned to the left, crossed the Newmarket-road, and forward to Durel's Park, pointing a little for East End; turned to the right, as though he meant Burchanger; but he again altered his course, running straight for Taylor's Wood, and was killed just going into Takeley Forest, at the end of forty minutes. Distance from point to point near six miles; but at any rate the hounds must have covered nine miles. This ends one of the best days that has been seen for years.—I am, Sir, yours, A RED ROVER.

HUNTING EXTRAORDINARY.—As a funeral procession was proceeding to the church at Royston, on Thursday last, a hare, with the Ecclesfield pack of hounds close upon her, came at full speed down the town, and poor puss was killed in the midst of the mourners.—Doncaster Chronicle.

THE BRIGHTON HARRIERS met on Saturday at the Dyke. The field was large, and the morning gay. Found the first hare on Portslade Tenantry Hill, making for Diamond, Cock-a-Rooost, back to White Lot, Pay Thorn, to the Front Hill, doubled back to White Lot, and was lost, after a beautiful run of 35 minutes. Found again close by, going off for the Tenantry Hill, Atlingworth Barn, the Roost, leaving Portslade to the left, for Southwick Furze, over Thunder's Barrow, dipping the next bottom for the Honey Cocks, White Lot, to the Roost, where she was killed, being an exceedingly good run of 55 minutes. Found a third in Bentfield's Bottom, going away at score for West Bottom, crossing the Dyke Road for Pond Brow, to the Brink of the Dyke, where they got a view, into Botting's Furze, broke again for the Dyke House, turned short to the left for Fulking Hill, skirted Scah's Castle Furze for Atlingworth Barn, up the hill for New England, where she made a sudden turn for New Barn Furze; getting up a view, they ran into her near the New England Pond. This was a splendid forty minutes, with only one check, and ended a capital day's sport. They also met on Monday at Patcham. Found on the Middle Brow, bending her course for Standean South Hill, headed back for the Holt, which she skirted, to her old quarters, where she squatted in a piece of rape; getting up a view, they sent her away over Keymer Hill, dipping the next bottom for the Front Hill, leaving the Stripes to the left, down the hill to the Whiteland's Shaw, on for Clayton, crossed the Lewes Road to the London Rail, passed over that into Clayton Wood, where they unfortunately moved a fresh hare, being a bad finish of an excellent run. Returned to a hare in Patcham Bottom, making for the Tegden, the Level Barn, headed back for the Tegden, to the Junipers, doubled back her foil to Patcham Bottom, where she squatted in a piece of rape, going away a view for the Dencher, turned to the left for Ewe Bottom, Deep Bottom, and was killed in the Holt, after a good run of 52½ minutes. Found another on South Hill, going away at railroad speed for Winder's Hill Plantation, through the Standean Coverts, for Clayton Bottom, turned to the right over Keymer Hill, taking the Ditchling dips to the Beacon down, the Front Hill to the Lime Kiln, crossed the road for Ditchling, and was killed close to Jointer's Copse. This was a splendid run of fifty minutes, the pace being very severe, and it was with great difficulty the horses lived with them over the turf.

THE QUEEN'S COUNTY HOUNDS.—The first meet of the season of these hounds took place on Thursday week at Sheffield, and if the opening day be any omen to those that follow, we may expect a brilliant season. The hounds found at once, on being put into cover, but there was no scent up to two o'clock. After hanging about the cover, and taking one ring round Derry bottom, hounds were drawn off. They were then trotted to Cullennagh, which was blank. Der-yore, so well known to the sporting men of the Queen's County and County Kilkenny, was then the order; and well did it maintain its character—for no sooner were the hounds thrown into cover than they found an old fox. After being hunted once at the Kilkenny side, he broke as if for Cullennagh, but turned at Blandsfort, and not within a field of the cover, and crossed the Abheyleix and Ballinakill roads; turned short to the left, and up Knock-hill, which stopped nearly all the field; as by the time they got to the top, the hounds were entering Mr. Cassan's farm half a mile a head;
